John Fitzgeld Kennedy was one of nine children who were sons and daughters of Irish emigrants who came to The United states when the patato famine hit Ireland. I belive that Jack (J.F.K's nickname) grew up to be an important person because his familly pushed and supported him with vigor and J.F.K had many challinges that taught him of courage indurance and bravery.

A fact that backs up my belief is that Jack was always in the shadow of his older brother Joe and that pushed Jack to try his best so he could beat his brother Joe. I also think J.F.K was pushed by his father to win and Jack wanted to make his dad proud. A third thing that backs up my belief is J.F.K caugh scarlet fever at age 2½ and had to be kept away from his mom and baby sister. Jack also had a painful back injury that he got playing football at Chaite.

I chose to write about J.F.K. as a young boy and young man because I feel it shaped him to be a good president.
