

Salamander eggs are laid in water and are held together by jelly-like goo.

A salamander larva develops in clear eggs that are in the water.

When small salamanders hatch out of the eggs they have gills and front legs.

As the salamander gets bigger it grows back legs.

When salamanders grow big enough, they come out of the water and live on the land.