

Devil's Orchard Trail

Two thousand years ago, nearby volcanoes erupted so violently that they tore themselves apart. Rivers of lava floated huge chunks of crater wall down to this spot. Time passed. Rocks crumbled. The seeds of rabbitbrush and limber pine took root in the sparse soil. A hundred years ago, a visiting minister declared this jumble of rocks, shrubs, and trees to be a garden fit for the devil himself.

Welcome to Devil's Orchard.

“What you see depends mainly on what you look for.”

—Richard J. Vogl, biologist

The trail through this place is as unusual as its name. Rather than identify objects the exhibits here challenge you to think about ideas, concerns, and possible solutions.