A different kind of memorial has taken shape to tell the story of Flight 93; it is more than just one memorial feature, it is an entire memorial landscape. Through this tour, we will explore the architect's intent for this landscape and opportunities to discover your own personal meanings. Designed by Paul Murdoch Architects, and chosen through an international design competition, this is a place that can be experienced in many ways. A place of grand vistas and intimate spaces. A place both severe and serene, the memorial acknowledges a time of violence, but offers a place of healing. A place of individual parts that come together to create a great whole. A place, rather than imposing on the land, designed to work in harmony with the earth, trees, and sky. This is a place that is rooted in the natural and cultural heritage of the region, but also a place of change. This memorial landscape is designed as a series of experiences, some subtle and some monumental, providing many different ways to honor and reflect on the story of Flight 93. This place serves as both a national memorial and for each visitor as a very personal memorial. What personal meanings will you discover? How will this place speak to you?
