COMBINED DETERMINATION – Design Tour Stop 306

Please remember out of courtesy for your fellow visitors and being so close to the crash site to not use the speaker function on your phone while listening to the tour. Thank You.

The story of Flight 93 is both the story of individuals and the story of a group of people. The passengers and crew were each, like all of us, individuals. They had their own lives, their own personalities, and their own place in this world. They were a diverse group in so many ways; nationality, age, race, lifestyle. They were mostly strangers and may not have ever learned each other's names, but the realization they were part of a larger attack lead to a vote and collective decision to take action. Forty memorial groves now line the Ring Road, each grove part of the larger memorial element, but each grove distinctive. Forty individual panels of the Wall of Names, separated by thin slivers of air and light, acknowledge that these were individual people. On each is inscribed the name of a passenger or crew member; the names of mothers, fathers, sons, daughters, wives, husbands, sisters, and brothers. But if one steps back, the forty individual panels become one wall, reminding us of their combined determination. This idea is also seen in the ceremonial gateway. The wood of the gate is cut in forty facets. Each facet is distinctive and individual. Again, together they create a greater whole, a reminder of their combined action. In what ways can we honor them through actions of our own?
