Gordon’s Flank Attack Trail
Battle of the Wilderness

Please help us preserve the earthworks by not walking on them.

Gordon’s Flank Attack
Evening, May 6, 1864

This two-mile trail winds through the remnants of Confederate and Union earthworks built on May 5 and 6, 1864. Combat flared along these lines throughout the battle, culminating in a dramatic Confederate flank attack on the evening of May 6—the last major action of the Battle of the Wilderness.

Along the trail, tablets tell the story of the fighting. Wear bug repellant; bring water.

The Battle of the Wilderness

The first clash between Lee and Grant took place in the sparsely settled area long known as “The Wilderness.” For two days, May 5-6, 1864, battle raged along the region’s two major roads.

This trail follows the fighting along and north of the historic Orange Turnpike (Route 20). Three miles south, along the Orange Plank Road (Route 621), a parallel battle erupted.

The Visible Remnants of Battle

Along the trail, you will see low mounds that are all that remain of the earth and log works (right) built by soldiers during the battle. After the fighting on May 6, the Confederates seized long stretches of Union earthworks, then re-faced them for their own use.
“Wherever Lee goes, you will go also.” That admonition from Union commander Ulysses S. Grant to army commander George G. Meade came to pass here in Saunders Field on May 5, 1864. Meade urged an immediate assault here. It failed, but that initial combat largely shaped the next 36 hours of fighting, as each side extended their lines north and south from Saunders Field, seeking an advantage.

When the Confederates of Richard S. Ewell’s Corps arrived on the edge of Saunders Field the morning of May 5, 1864, they started digging. The works here are likely the first built on the Wilderness Battlefield. The Confederates here weathered not just the initial Union assaults on May 5, but sporadic fighting through May 6, leaving Saunders Field littered with dead, wounded, and the wreckage of battle.

Marching from the fords of the Rapidan, thousands of Union soldiers approached the Wilderness Battlefield along this road, marching from the northeast (YOUR RIGHT?). At first, Union commanders hoped that troops moving along this road would outflank the Confederates fighting in Saunders Field. Instead, they found the Confederate line extended north into this area, and fighting raged here as Union soldiers groped through the thick woods.

Throughout the battle, pockets of combat exploded in these woods. With visibility limited due to the forest cover, every burst of combat caused anxiety for those nearby--fearful that one side or the other had managed a breakthrough. Advancing lines often stumbled into an unseen enemy or fired blindly into the woods. “We soon began to fire by ear-sight,” remembered one Union soldier.

On the morning of May 6, major fighting erupted along the Orange Plank Road (Route 621), four miles to the south. Here, north of the Orange Turnpike, Union troops launched sporadic attacks to keep the Confederates here occupied--to prevent them from moving south to help. The men in the ranks knew little or nothing of why they were being sent into battle in these woods that morning. Still, hundreds fell that day in what history has labeled a “holding action.”

Late on May 6, Gordon’s men stealthily moved north into what is today the Lake of the Woods subdivision. Then, with a rush through the forest, they descended on the Union right flank. “Their line crumbled immediately under our first volley,” wrote a Confederate, “and I could see them...throwing up their hands and surrendering by scores.” A Union soldier recalled, “It was an awful place, an awful moment...The woods were filled with all kinds of noise.”

Though on a smaller scale, Gordon’s flank attack shared two similarities with Jackson’s famous flank attack at Chancellorsville. In both, success disordered the victors, causing confusion in Confederate lines, while gathering darkness made it more difficult to keep the attack going. Confederates fired on their own men. Lines became tangled in the woods. As darkness fell, the attack faltered, and Union troops escaped to new lines farther east.

The last combat of the battle reshaped the battlefield, forcing the Union army to build new lines farther to the east. That evening and the next day, the Confederates moved forward and adapted the former Union earthworks for their own use--adding to them where necessary. The result: these woods feature a jumble of intersecting works that faithfully reflect the confusion and chaos of the Wilderness.