The Galvanized Yankees

In The Museum of Westward Expansion, a very small number of exhibits represent the American Civil War. The U.S. Army is profiled during the post-Civil War period of conflict with American Indians on the frontier, while the war years of 1861-1865 are dedicated to topics such as the Trans-continental telegraph lines or the Pony Express. Contrary to popular belief, however, the War Between the States was not limited to the East. Secession issues reached as far west as California, and Rebels fought Yankees in the Arizona, New Mexico, and Oklahoma territories. In addition, a little-known group of soldiers called “Galvanized Yankees” protected the vital lifelines to the west during the closing months of the war.

The term “galvanized” is most commonly associated with metal when it is coated with zinc to protect it from corrosion. In the process the surface color of the metal is altered, but underneath the coating the steel is unchanged. During the Civil War, in both Northern and Southern prison camps, soldiers sometimes decided to “galvanize,” or change sides, to save themselves from the horrors of prison life. Like the metal, these galvanized soldiers in many cases were still “Good old Rebels,” or “Billy Yanks,” underneath their adopted uniforms.

In the early days of the war, prison camps were merely holding areas where men waited to be exchanged for equal numbers of prisoners held by the other side. In 1863, however, the prisoner exchange system broke down, causing prison camps to become permanent areas of incarceration, where growing numbers of men had no hope of release until the end of the war. Prison camps, (such as the Confederate camp at Andersonville, Georgia, or the Union camp at Alton, Illinois), were horrible, filthy places which lacked all the basic necessities of life. Worn-out clothing offered little protection from the elements, and the only shelter for the men was what they could improvise for themselves. Soldiers were seldom issued new clothing, and often starved due to meager food allowances. Many saw enlistment in the enemy forces as an escape, and took advantage of the personnel shortage in either army by joining it.

This posed a new problem to both armies, since most recruits were still loyal to their original army and would desert at the first opportunity. On December 28, 1864, at Egypt Station, Mississippi, a Confederate regiment composed of 250 “galvanized” soldiers threw down their arms and surrendered as they were charged by Union troops. These men were sent to the Union prison in Alton as deserters, but were saved from individual trials by General Grenville Dodge, who recruited them into the 5th and 6th U.S. Volunteers. The experiment of enlisting prisoners became a concern for the U.S. War Department, and policies surrounding this practice continually changed. In 1862, Colonel James Mulligan discovered that many Confederate prisoners did not wish to be exchanged, and were willing to join the Union army; he illegally enlisted former Confederates to be used on the front lines. It was not until 1864 that President Lincoln finally endorsed the enlisting of ex-Confederates.

Events in the eastern theater of the war continually overshadowed events in the West. However, two important incidents gave settlers in the West reason to be concerned for their safety, especially since most of the able-bodied men had left the frontier to fight on eastern battlefields. By 1862, members of the Sioux nation had been living on the Minnesota reservation for twenty years, and had accumulated many grievances. Provisions and treaty goods were often shoddy or were stolen by traders. Worst of all was the uninterrupted immigration of new settlers, which eventually forced the Sioux to give up nearly 900,000 acres of their reservation lands for 30 cents an acre. The starving Sioux had had enough, and attempted to regain their ancestral lands. As a result, settlers and missionaries fled from the Minnesota frontier, seeking safety in New Ulm and St. Paul. On the first day of the Sioux uprising, 1500 settlers were killed, and the town of New Ulm was saved only by the efforts of ill-equipped local volunteers.

In 1864, Colonel John Chivington further inflamed the frontier by leading 700 volunteers in an early morning raid on an encampment of 550 Cheyenne and Arapaho at Sand Creek, Colorado. Under orders to take no prisoners, the soldiers killed 150 men, women, and children. Word of the raid spread throughout the plains, causing deep resentment among the Cheyenne and Sioux, who retaliated by terrorizing the Oregon trail and U.S. mail routes.

Both events highlighted a problem for the settlers; Native Americans were beginning to fight for their lands, yet only a handful of U.S. soldiers and frightened civilians, many armed only with pitchforks, were available to protect themselves from the "Indian Uprisings." As a result, General Ulysses S. Grant ordered a contingent of Galvanized soldiers, by then called U.S. Volunteers and commanded by Northern officers, to the frontier to protect the trails, telegraph lines, and U.S. Mail routes. Doubts about the loyalty and reliability of these ex-Confederates were alleviated, since frontier duty would prevent them from fighting their old comrades.

Six regiments of U.S. Volunteers were formed between early 1864 and June of 1865. Representative of the experiences of these units was the history of the 1st U.S. Volunteers, who were recruited from the prison camp at Point Lookout, Virginia, and served under 23-year-old Colonel Charles Dimon. Dimon was eager to test his men in battle, and the unit was sent to Elizabeth City, North Carolina, where they fired a few shots, seized horses and bales of cotton. General Grant was opposed to their continued use in the East, saying that "it is not right to expose them where, to be taken prisoners, they might surely suffer as deserters." The 1st U.S. Volunteers, 1000 men strong, boarded the ship Continental in August of 1864, sailed to New York, then traveled by train to Chicago. Six companies proceeded to St. Louis, where they boarded the steamboat Effie Deans and headed for their new home, Ft. Rice, in the Dakota Territory. Originally, the Effie Deans was supposed to take the regiment all the way to their new post, however, the Missouri River was low that year, and the 600 men were forced to march a distance of over 270 miles. The trip was extremely arduous. The regiment lacked tents to protect themselves from pelting rain and hail, and initially had no wagons to carry what meager supplies they had been issued. The regiment arrived at Ft. Rice on October 17th. They made the journey from New York with surprisingly few desertions, surviving on salt pork, hardtack, coffee and whatever water they could find. Many of the soldiers suffered from chronic diarrhea and scurvy by the end of their march.

Life at their new home proved to be a challenge. The fort had not been fully completed, its buildings being made of cottonwood, a very inferior material. Colonel Dimon was inexperienced in dealing with Native Americans. Though he befriended Two Bears, of the Yanktonai Sioux, he made the mistake of considering Two Bears' enemies to be his own. The young Colonel quickly learned that not all the Indians around the fort were as friendly as Two Bears, and soldiers were frequently ambushed and mutilated. The soldier's weapon, the Springfield rifle, was ineffective against the Sioux, as it was a single-shot muzzle-loader which required fifteen seconds to reload. The Indians could shoot their arrows at a much faster rate.

Though the situation remained tense, life at Fort Rice improved in small ways. In November the men raised $1000 to buy their colonel a sword, silk sash, silver inlaid revolver, and field glasses. When these gifts were presented, the Colonel was “hardly able to speak.” The soldiers published a weekly newspaper entitled The Frontier Scout, which served to partially dispel the remoteness of their post. A homelike atmosphere was created by 21-year-old Elizabeth Cardwell, the wife of Private Patrick Cardwell, who accompanied the regiment all the way up the Missouri and shared the soldiers’ hardships on the march. She was held in the highest esteem by the men, and became the “mother figure” of the Regiment. Fort Rice was not a good assignment, however, and many died of disease or violence during the winter of 1865.

Throughout the existence of the galvanized units, six regiments were formed and sent to the west. They were recruited from Union prison camps at Point Lookout, MD (1st and 4th Regiments), Rock Island, IL (2nd and 3rd), and Alton IL, Camp Douglas IL, Camp Chase OH and Camp Morton IN (5th and 6th). They garrisoned frontier forts which were low on manpower at a time of general unrest among American Indians. They were stationed along the Missouri River, Oregon and Santa Fe Trails. From New Mexico to Montana, they endured Indian attacks, cold winters, disease, and grueling marches. Despite these hardships, they rebuilt trans-continental telegraph lines, restored stagecoach and mail routes between Missouri and California, escorted supply trains along the Santa Fe Trail, and protected wagon trains as they crossed the plains. By the time many of the Galvanized regiments reached their western posts the Civil War had ended, and as a result, they had a short life. The 1st U.S. Volunteers were mustered out on November 27, 1865, only a year and a month after they first reached Ft. Rice. The last of the six regiments lasted a year longer, with the final Galvanized Yankee becoming a civilian on November 13, 1866.

Galvanized soldiers were shunned in the South, and neglected by the Grand Army of the Republic when the war ended. For most of the Galvanized Yankees, there was little left in the South to return home to. Some went back to rebuild their homes and careers, while others decided to remain in the West, with the chance to start new lives on the American frontier. Despite the varied origins of the 6000 men who were “Galvanized” during the war, each had the chance to prove his loyalty to the United States. They were a valuable presence at a time and place in which they were needed. Captain Enoch Adams, a commander of troops at Fort Rice, wrote that “their whole course and behavior has displayed that unadulterated patriotism was the only motive that urged them on.... Many have laid down their lives at the beck of disease, some have been murdered by the arrow of the [Indian], and with but few exceptions, living or dead, have been true to their trust.” The Galvanized soldiers turned from the task of fighting a war to divide the United States, and joined a cause which endeavored to expand and strengthen the nation. Their unusual story is one of the least known and most ironic tales of the American West.
