AUGUSTA, GEORGIA

Field Notes on Historic Sites
October 20, 1936

Herbert E. Kahler
&
Ralston B. Lattimore
Augusta, Georgia.

Field Notes on Historic Sites

The principal historic sites in Augusta, Georgia, are well marked and cared for.

Fort Augusta

Fort Augusta, built in 1736 by General James Oglethorpe, occupied a site on the Savannah River which is now the yard of St. Paul's Episcopal Church. The site is marked by a granite cross, which bears the following inscription:

> This Stone Marks the Site of the Colonial Fort Augusta, built by Order of General Oglethorpe and the Trustees in 1736; and Known During the Revolution as Fort Cornwallis.

St. Paul's Church was built in 1750 under a curtain of this fort.

Congress of Five Nations

On a rear corner of St. Paul's Church, a tablet has been erected by the Colonial Dames to mark the site of the Indian Treaty of 1763. The inscription on the tablet is as follows:

> "To commemorate the Great Congress of five Indian nations held here at Fort Augusta in 1763, when seven hundred Indians came to meet the Governors of Georgia, Virginia, North and South Carolina.

> Erected by the Augusta Committee of the Georgia Society of the Colonial Dames of America, 1830."

Fort Grierson

About a quarter of a mile west of the Fort Augusta site the approximate site of Fort Grierson has been marked with a bronze tablet bearing the following inscription:

> Approximate Site of Fort Grierson

A British post during their occupancy of Augusta, Georgia.
Captured by American forces on May 23, 1781, under General
Andrew Pickens, Colonel Henry Lee, Colonel Elijah Clarke.
Erected by City of Augusta
Richard E. Allen, Jr.,
Mayor.
1936. DAR

McKay's Trading Post

At 1822 Broad Street a two story white house has been marked as follows:

The White House or McKay's Trading Post
Used by the British as a fort during Colonel Elijah Clarke's attempt to recapture Augusta, September 14-15, 1780.
Thirteen wounded Americans were hanged from the staircase.
Erected by City of Augusta
Richard E. Allen, Jr.,
Mayor.
1936. DAR

Confederate Powder Works

In front of the Sibley Manufacturing Company, near the Savannah River on the Augusta Power Canal is a red brick obelisk chimney about 110 feet high and 25 feet square at the base, which marks the site of the Confederate Powder Works, which supplied the Confederate forces with a considerable portion of the powder used in the war between the States. The chimney is in an excellent state of repair.

Two tablets erected on the chimney bear the following inscriptions:

This obelisk chimney, sole reminder of the extensive Powder Works here erected under the auspices of the Confederate Government, is by the Confederate Survivors Association of Augusta, with the consent of the City Council, conserved in honor of a fallen nation and inscribed to the memory of those who died in the Southern Armies during the war between the States.

George Washington Rains, U. S. A.
Brigadier General Ordnance C. S. A.
I. V. M. Major, U. S. A.
Captain 4th Artillery.
The under almost insuperable difficulties erected and successfully operated these powder works—a bulwark of the beleaguered Confederacy.

United States Arsenal

On Walton Way at Orange Street is the old United States Arsenal constructed in the early part of the 19th century, seized by Georgia troops at the end of January, 1861, and repaired by the United States in 1865 toward the close of the war. The buildings in the arsenal enclosure are in excellent condition, and the grounds are ornamented by numerous early 19th century and civil war type cannons. The property is owned and occupied by the United States Army, but the public is permitted access to the grounds.

Graves of Lyman Hall and George Walton
Signers of the Declaration of Independence

The bones of Lyman Hall and George Walton have been interred under a monument on Greene Street.

Home of Charles Gedcott Jones, Jr.
Georgia Historian

The residence of the late Charles Gedcott Jones, Jr., 2249 Walton Way, is owned by the Estate of Mrs. C. C. J. Carpenter, and is occupied by the grandchildren of the historian. It is in excellent condition. On the lawn in front of the residence is an iron cannon, which was removed some years ago from Fort Morris on the Georgia coast by Mr. Jones.

On the following page are photographs of several sites in Augusta.
Granite cross marking the site of Old Fort Augusta, which was built by Oglethorpe in 1736. Behind the cross can be seen the verge of the Savannah River. The site of the fort is now the yard of St. Paul's Episcopal Church, Augusta, Ga.
St. Paul's Church yard, Augusta, Ga., the site of the colonial fort, erected by Oglethorpe in 1736.

Iron cannon found on the site of old Fort Augusta. This piece of ordnance probably used in the Revolution.
St. Paul's Episcopal Church
Augusta, Georgia.

Site of the English church erected about 1780.
The present building is a reproduction of the early 19th century church that was destroyed in the Augusta fire of 1916.
"The White House" or "McKay's Trading Post" used by the British as a fort, Sept. 14-18, 1780. Located at 1822 Broad Street, Augusta, Ga.
The red brick obelisk chimney, which is the sole remainder of the Confederate powder works at Augusta, Georgia.
Home of Hurbey Scott Jones, Jr., Georgia
Historian, candler way, Augusta, Ga., constructed latter half of the 19th century.
Sincerely yours,

Herbert J. Kahler, Superintendent,
Fort Marion National Monument,

Raisin B. Lattimore, Act'g Sup't
Fort Pulaski National Monument.

October 22, 1936.
SOME PRELIMINARY NOTES ON THE LOCATION OF "BLOODY MARSH", ST. SIMONS ISLAND, GA.

James W. Holland

1937
SOME PRELIMINARY NOTES

on the

LOCATION OF "BLOODY MARSH", ST. SIMONS ISLAND, GA.

by

James W. Holland,
Junior Park Historien

without

Sutherland Account
The site of the engagement on St. Simons Island, Georgia, in which the forces of Spain were turned back in a surprise encounter with Oglethorpe's men has been long, and still is, a matter of controversy. Some authorities would place it within two or three miles of the old town of Frederica; others hold that it occurred at "Bloody Marsh" or "Bloody Bend" some four or five miles farther south. At this latter point, a monument has been erected.

The purpose of the account which follows is not to attempt the settlement of the controversy; that would require extended study and even then the findings might not be of sufficient strength to warrant an unqualified statement about the definite and exact location. The writer of this memorandum has deliberately made very extensive use of quotation, thus letting the proponents of the two sides of the question tell their own story. He reserves judgment until further study is made.

Brief and sketchy as is the following memorandum, it is based upon a study of some of the original records; these include the report of Montiano, Spanish commander; Oglethorpe's report and letters; the journal of Desiine, a Spanish who was a member of the expeditionary force; and an anonymous letter written from Frederica two days after the engagement and quoted verbatim in the Spalding account.
Introduction.— On July 7, 1742, occurred, on St. Simons Island, a sea island off the Georgia coast, a military engagement of importance quite disproportionate to the relatively small number of men engaged in it. There the question of English or Spanish supremacy in Georgia and Carolina, the "debatable land," was largely settled, although the English leader did not at the time believe that to be the case.

Since 1736, that leader, James Edward Oglethorpe, had been preparing St. Simon's Island as the spearhead of English defense against the Spanish attack that appeared certain to come. In preparation, Oglethorpe made trips to England to raise men and supplies. Most of these he took to St. Simons and there laid out the town and fort of Frederica on the river of that name about half-way down the eastern coast of the island and St. Simons Fort (or Soldier's Fort) about seven miles S.E. of Frederica at the southern point of the island. From the 25th to the 28th of September, 1736, Oglethorpe set every man on the island to the task of cutting through a road to connect the two fortified points. It was along this road that the memorable victory was won, but at exactly what point on the road is in question.

The Road.— No detailed description of the road, written at the time of its building, has been found. The following is from an account by Thomas Youlding (Collections of the Georgia Historical Society, I [1849], 261 n.), whose qualifications to write of the terrain of St. Simons will be indicated later:

"This road, after passing out of the town of Frederica, in a south-east direction, entered a beautiful prairie of a mile over, when it penetrated a dense close oak wood; keeping the same course for two miles, it passed to the eastern marsh that bounded St. Simons soundward. Along this marsh, being dry and hard, no road was necessary, and none was made. This natural highway was bounded on the east by rivers and creeks, and impracticable marshes; it was bounded on the west (the island side) by a thick wood covered with palmetto and vines of every character so as to be impracticable for any body of men, and could only be travelled singly and alone. This winding way along the marsh was continued for two miles, when it again passed up to the high land which had become open and clear, and from thence it proceeded in a direct line to the fort of St. Simons Fort, at the sea entrance, around which for two hundred acres, five acre allotments of land for the soldiers had been laid out, cleared, and improved. I have been thus particular in my description because it sets to the manner in which the road was laid out and executed, that General Oglethorpe used the preservation of the fort and town of Frederica."

Nothing in the foregoing description, nor even the final interpretative sentence, need be discarded by proponents of either of the possible sites of the English victory.
The Spanish Invasion.-- At Madrid, on October 31, 1741, a movement was started by Minister Don José de Camillo, under orders of Philip V for an expedition against the English settlers of the "debateable land." The organization of the enterprise was entrusted to Don Francisco de Guzmán y Moretisitas, governor of Cuba. He, on June 8, 1742, delegated the command of the invading forces to the governor of Florida, Don Manuel de Fontinio. The purpose of the attack is very clearly set forth in a letter from Moretisitas to Montesinos (Spanish Official Report," in Coll. Ge. Hist. Soc., Vol. VII, pt. 3, p. 30) "... And I am expecting at the very least that the forces furnished will without the slightest let or hindrance forthwith destroy all the plantations as far as Fort Royal ... as far as its force will reach, and events permit, lay waste Caroline and its dependencies. But this course must be consistent with the information your Lordship may obtain from prisoners ... looking to the secure withdrawal of our forces through the interior channels between the Keys. It is of the greatest consequence and importance to rescue and destroy Caroline and its plantations. This result can be better secured by first getting rid of the regiment of Ogilby's, which might proceed to the defense of some other point where hostilities had broken out, if not fired attacked where they are now at Qualquini and Saint Simon ... It is entirely probable that surprised by this blow, they will abandon everything and flee to the woods."

On June 28, the Spanish force, variously estimated from 33 vessels and 2,000 men to 56 vessels and 7,000 men, appeared off the bar of St. Simons and, on July 5, crossed over on a spring tide, being bombarded the while "very hotly from the shipping and batteries." The stout resistance offered by Ogilby's was of no avail, however, and the Spanish fleet won the passage in the river. Thereupon the English commander decided to abandon St. Simon's Fort and the southern part of the island, destroy all materials which might be of use to the Spaniards, and retire to Frederica, there to make his final stand.

Evidence for Locating Site Near Frederica.-- On July 7, Montesinos sent out two parties to reconnoiter, being unwilling to follow Ogilby's over the unknown road to Frederica. One of the parties, however, through some unexplained mistake, joined the other the other, and the combined force of one hundred and seventy men and forty Indian scouts moved over the road toward Frederica. "These two parties continued as far as the town," reported Montesinos, "in whose vicinity they were attacked by a body of English and Indians in a very narrow defile in the woods." (Spanish Official Account," in Coll. Ge. Hist. Soc., vol. VII, pt. 3, p. 91).

An English observer wrote two days after the skirmish "... the rengers came in, and gave account that the enemy was within a mile of Frederica." (Quoted in Coll. Ge. Hist. Soc., 1, 277).
At this point, Ogilthorpe "advanced with a party of Indian Rangers and the Highland Company . . . being resolved to engage them in the defiles of the woods apparently at the edge of Fredericksburg before they could get out and form on the open ground."

The assault was successful, and the Spanish party fled in confusion. He . . . pursued them two miles," wrote Ogilthorpe in his report dated July 30, 1742 (Coll. Ga. Hist. Soc., III, 136), "to an open meadow or savannah upon the edge of which I posted three platoons of the Regiment and the Company of Highland foot so as to be well covered by the woods from the enemy who were obliged to pass through the meadow under our fire. It will be noted that, supposing all the witnesses cited to be creditable, the position taken up would be somewhat less than three miles southeast of Fredericksburg. Furthermore, Ogilthorpe wrote: "This disposition was very fortunate." (Ibid., Italics are mine.) implying that the troops rested in the position at which they were stationed and that the engagement took place there.

Meanwhile Montiano, receiving word of the defeat, the initial skirmish had "detected three companies of grenadiers to support our troops and cover their retreat." ("Spanish Officer," in Coll. Ga. Hist. Soc., Vol. VII, pt. 3, p. 21) This force, Ogilthorpe reported, "advanced from the Spanish camp into the savannah with Huzzahs and fired with great spirit but not severing our men by reason of the woods none of their shot took place but were done." Some

His report continues: "Some platoons of men in the heat of the fight the air being darkened with the smoke and a shower of rain falling retiring in disorder. The Spaniards seem not to have been aware of this retreat by part of the English forces; Montiano, who in his report emphasized every accomplishment of his men, does not even mention it. It is most certain that the routed men could not be seen in the dense wood which hid them from the Spaniards.

Ogilthorpe continued the story: "I hearing the firing from Fredericksburg rode towards it and at near two miles from the place of action met a great many men in disorder who told me ours were routed and Lieutenant Sutherland killed. I ordered them to halt and march back against the enemy. . . . As I heard the fire continue I concluded our men could not be quite beaten and that my immediate assistance might preserve them; therefore spurred on arrived just as the fire was done. I found the Spaniards entirely routed by one Platoon of the Regiment under the command of Lieutenant Sutherland and the Highland Company under the Command of Lieutenant Charles Hackett." (Ogilthorpe's Report, in Coll. Ga. Hist. Soc., III, 136).

The struggle has been well-told and having reached the scene of the late action, there then occurred a minor aftermath of the conflict which perhaps has given rise to the difference of opinion as to the location of the site of the engagement known locally as "Bloody marsh." Again quoting Ogilthorpe: "Capt. Devereux and Insig O'Gibbons being arrived with the men they had rallied Lieut. Cadogan with an advanced party of the Regiment and soon after the whole Regiment Indians and Rangers I marched down to a Causeway over a Marsh very near the Spanish Camp over which all were obliged to pass and thereby stop the those who had been dispersed in the fight in the Swamp from getting to the Spanish Camp." (Abibb., 137. Italics are mine.)

If Oglethorpe's own account be accepted literally, it would seem to place the site of the major action some three miles from Frederica and the site of the anti-climax of dealing with the remnants of the defeated Spanish forces at the marsh where the monument commemorating the battle now stands. Incidentally, Oglethorpe, as far as this writer has thus far discovered, never employed the term "Bloody Marsh". On the contrary, in two different communications he referred to the site of the engagement as the "General James Oglethorpe" (Oglethorpe to Trustees, Apr. 5, 1742 in Col. Ga. Hist. Soc., III, 123 and in Colonial Records of Georgia, XXIII, 398; Report on engagement, July 30, 1742, in Col. Ga. Hist. Soc., III, 139).

Evidence for Locating the Near St. Simon's Fort (then the Spanish Camp)-- and now to a brief consideration of the site some two miles from the southern point of the island, where the monument now stands. Thomas Spalding, native of St. Simons and a grandson of one of the participants in the engagement, and a man of unquestioned veracity, states first to have advanced the thesis which would locate the site near the south end of the island. In his "Sketch of the Life of General James Oglethorpe," in Collections of the Georgia Historical Society, published in 1860 (p. 240-50), Spalding quotes a contemporary account which, in substantial agreement with the other sources, locates the first skirmish on July 7 at "within a mile" of Frederica, and states that Oglethorpe, after pursuing nearly a mile . . . halted and posted his troops to advantage in the woods; they were then bidden by the officer of the letter was written at Frederica to order the regiments and companies to march. In his returning to the late field of action, he met three platoons in great disorder, who gave him an account that they had been broken by the Spaniards, who were extremely numerous. Notwithstanding which he rallied them, rode on, and to his great satisfaction found that Lieut. Langford and Lieut. Percival with the Highlanders had entirely defeated the enemy, who consisted of six hundred men. (Quoted in Spalding, op. cit., 277).

Spalding, however, was not inclined to accept this account, even though he quoted it verbatim and in its entirety in his work. As he pointed out: "In the details that have been given of that day, written probably in a hurry, and certainly by one not himself engaged in the action, there is some confusion of position, and some mingling of events, which can only be understood by one familiar in his childhood.
with the scenes, and who has travelled it over often, with more than one that was himself an actor in the conflict." (Spalding,

"In the basis of thorough familiarity with the terrain and relationship to and acquaintance with some veterans of the memorable defense, Spalding locates the site and reconstructs the action as follows:

"... the road cut out from Frederica to the south end of the island of St. Simons where the fort and sea battery were placed, ... proceeded in a south-eastern direction, for two or three miles, where it reached the eastern marsh; ... this marsh was bounded to the east or seaward, by a thick impracticable morass; on the west, by dense, close wood. The highway continued along this marsh for two miles, opening into wide spreads of firm land, fit for the maneuvering of men. But when it had again approached within two miles of the south end, there was a bend in crescent form, in which the road was not more than twenty yards wide; on the east or convex-side of the crescent an intense morass, on the concave or western shore of the crescent an extreme thick brushwood. After passing this strait, the road entered an open wood of oaks and other timber, concealing the movement of troops, but not giving passage to them. This wood continued for about a mile or two before the fort of St. Simons and open grounds expanded to the view." (Ibid., 281-82).

"It was in this open wood," continues the Spalding account,
"General Oglethorpe had, in retiring from Frederica, left a few rangers and some Indians to watch the motions of the Spaniards, and this wood was the scene of action on the morning of the seventh of July." (Referring to the first skirmish)

The account continues:

"Two companies of Spaniards and some Spanish Indians at the dawn of day issued from the Spanish camp and made an attack on the rangers and Indians within the wood (St. Simons's report, ante, p. 27). They drove the rangers and Indians to the mouth of the defile, but did not attempt to pass it. The first movement of the Spaniards had been communicated ... to the General. He hurried to the scene of action, and with his advance overthrew the Spaniards and pursued them to the open field in view of the fort covering St. Simons fort."

Thinking that the small Spanish force indicated a slight to draw him away from Frederica (still according to the Spalding version), Oglethorpe left two companies of his regiment, the Highland company and the Indians to guard the road and wood and returned to Frederica. Finding all quiet there, he was hurrying back to the place the companies had been posted with all forces available for that purpose. Half-way there he met two companies and most of the Indians in full retreat. After rallying his men, he "continued . . . with hurried steps" (Oglethorpe says he rode, see ante, p. 3) until, arriving at the last bend of the marshy way, a scene opened upon him, which his proudest expectations could never have looked for. . . . The last bend of the marsh was covered by two hundred grenadiers, who lay dead or dying upon the field, while not an enemy was in sight. All was still, save sometimes at intervals a Highland shout or an Indian yell proclaimed that another and another had been found and dragged from his covert. But how rose that shout, how rang that yell, when the actors stoed around their chief to hail him victor of the day. Yet we have seen the eyes glisten, and the voice rise, fifty years afterwards as we fondly listened to the tale by one who had mingled in the strife and been a partner in the scene." (Ibid., 282-83)

Conclusion: Although suffering heavy loss on July 7, the Spaniards still very greatly outnumbered the English, and did not immediately withdraw from St. Simon's. That they did withdraw without any more serious fighting was attributed to several circumstances but have no relevance to the subject treated in this paper.

It is believed that by careful research, comparison of sources now available and the possible uncovering of others, thorough checking and weighing of historical evidence in the case, and an intensive study of the terrain, the location of "Bloody Marsh" or of "Grenadier Savannah" might possibly be determined beyond any reasonable doubt. Until that time, we can still agree with the writer who, in 1913, commented: "... the exact site of this engagement has long been much in doubt." (Coll. Ge. Hist. Soc., VII, pt. 3, p. 110)
Primary

Secondary

4. Coulter, K. Barton, A Short History of Georgia. Chapel Hill, North Carolina: Univ. of N. C. Press, 1932. Seems to follow Spalding in the verbal account of the engagement (pp. 45-48) and yet on p. 35 is map showing location almost exactly half-way between Frederica and St. Simons Island.

OTHER ACCOUNT

Of probably the greatest significance in determining questions concerning "Bloody Parish" is the pamphlet, now very rare, published by Lieut. Patrick Sutherland in London in 1743, entitled An Account of the Late Invasion of Georgia. Sutherland, who, with Jackey, was the greatest individual hero of the encounter, should be in a position to know much about the engagement, its site, and like points. This pamphlet is now in the Revenue Library, New Orleans, La., and has not yet been examined by the writer.

Other accounts, for the most part secondary, are suggested by C. C. Jones, Jr., in his "Dead Towns of Georgia" (p. 114, n.) His list follows:

Facing p. 17.—Map of Georgia, inset map of Great St. Simon’s, signed “R. S. S. C. S. Sculp.” No date, but the fact that the location of old, rather than new, canoe is shown tends to date it at not much later than 1757. Shows Frederica St. Simon’s fort, and the road connecting them. Original in the Beinecke Library.

Between pp. 110 and 111.—Two maps on single sheet. “St. Simon’s Island and Frederica” and “Battle Ground of Bloody Marsh.” Both signed “W. D.” Rough map prepared upon basis of study of the written accounts and an inspection of the terrain. The Spalding location is accepted.

In Horace Davis Cote, Our Yesterdays . . . Rev. ed. (1930).

Page 52—Map of St. Simon’s Island from Stevens History of Georgia, vol. I.

Page 69—“Map of the Town and Commons of Frederica, St. Simon’s Island, Georgia,” by Joshua Miller, Deputy Surveyor, by order of commissioners appointed by the General Assembly of Georgia in 1786. Tracing by D. H. Paulk from a photostat of original in office of Secretary of State, Atlanta. On this map note area marked “Great Savannah,” a short distance (no scale is given) N. E. of Frederica. It is possible that this map correspond to科创“Grenadier Savannah.” Page 60.— Plan of the Town of Frederica on the Island of St. Simons by Joshua Miller. . .
map shows location, number, etc., of the 98 town lots, the fort, guard house, barracks, etc.
tracing by R. R. Faulk from photostat in office of Secretary of State, Atlanta.

Page 68.— "Map of the Lands in the Vicinity of Frederica, St. Simons Island, made Sept. 21, 1801 by John McKimmon, surveyor at the request of Thomas Young, and being a resurvey of several tracts of land . . . formerly the property of John Graham, esq., and sold by the Commissioners of Confiscated Estates . . . made in conformity to a resurvey made by Jacob Lewis, a Surveyor in the year 1774."
This map locates the tract of land once occupied by Telethorpe. This tracing was made by Mrs. Maxfield Parrish from the original owned by Mrs. Eunice Hartridge.

Page 100.— "Historical Map Saint Simons Island, Glynn County, Georgia. Drawn from Margaret Evans Gate, 1829. Site of "Bloody Marsh" shown about 2 miles from e. point of island.

Between pages 44 and 45.— "Plan of the Town of Frederica, on St. Simon's Island, "Georgie." J. Bien Photo. Lith., N. Y.

In S. Barton Sautler, Great History of Georgia (1971)

Page 114.— "Coast of Georgia and Florida in the Spanish "ar." St. Simons Island and the Battle of Bloody Marsh are shown in inset. The location here is indicated as almost half way between Frederica and St. Simon's Fort. Taken from A. E. Brooks, History of Georgia (Chicago, 1913).
REPORT ON MIDWAY, LIBERTY COUNTY, GEORGIA

James W. Holland

1937
1. Critical Analysis of the Site

A. Synopsis. — Settled in 1752 by some three hundred and fifty Puritans who came from a previous settlement at Dorchester, South Carolina, the Hindem community was notable for its early and ardent support of the principles of the American Revolution. Strictly speaking, Hindem was not a town or even a well-defined region. In general, it was composed of the plantations of the communicants of the Hindem Congregational Church, built in 1756, which, in accordance with the theocratic ideals of Puritanism, became the center of the life of the community. In the Hindem group of sites may be included old Sunbury, founded in 1733 as a port for the Hindem planters, and in pre-revolutionary days a commercial rival of Savannah only to disappear later and be numbered among the "dead towns of Georgia." Immediately south of Sunbury, there still stands Fort Morris, one of the best preserved of the Revolution era earthworks, the last outpost of patriot defense in Georgia. North of the meeting house was the plantation of Lynn Hall, one of the three signers of the Declaration of Independence from Georgia. Another signer, Button Gwinnett, had his plantation residence on St. Catherine's Island, about ten miles from Sunbury which was his landing place on the mainland, his base of supplies, and his haven of refuge when dangers threatened his inland home from the descent of British war vessels and patrolling George Walton, the other Georgia signer, was sent to Sunbury as prisoner of war after the fall of Savannah in 1779.

The Hindem community is remarkable for at least two reasons. It has furnished a number of outstanding and useful citizens entirely out of proportion to its small population; among these may be numbered, in addition to those already mentioned, Dr. Abiel Holmes, author of the Annals and Father of Oliver坦尾ell Holmes, "author of American geography," John and Joseph LaCoste, eminent scientists and educators, Charles C. Jones, Jr., recognized historian of Georgia, and others. Hindem, too, was outstanding in the promotion of the spirit of liberty in a colony which, at best, in the early days of the movement was aesthetic. It was at Hindem that the American Revolution in Georgia was best exemplified.

B. Accurate Description of the Site. — Hindem Meeting House. Located about twenty-five miles south of Savannah, on U. S. Highway 179 (Atlantic Coastal Highway) and in a sparsely populated region, the Hindem Church (built 1793) stands in a clearing surrounded by rather heavy growth of timber and grasses. Little trace of the once thriving rice and indigo plantations can now be found. The terrain is the swamp type, which line intermediate to the salt marsh on the coast and the pine woods on the west. The Church is a very well preserved frame structure, two stories in height, with a steep roof which slopes at about a 45° angle. A wooden steeple supports a square weather-boarded tower. The upper floor has twenty-four windows, the large number being due to the fact that a negro balcony takes up most of the room on that floor. The church faces south on a sandy road that leads to Sunbury. Across this side-road, facing the main highway, is a newly constructed filling station and lunch room.

Sunbury.-- The site of this once thriving town overlooks the broad bend of the Ocmulgee River and out over the bay. St. Catherine's Island is clearly visible. To the south is an extensive salt marsh. All traces of the town have vanished and in its stead are woodland and a cleared field. Sunbury, along with Abacono, Schooner, Joseph's Town, and Frederica, has become one of the "dead towns of Georgia."

Lyman Hall Plantation.-- A wooded swamp, once the rice plantation of Lyman Hall, signer of the Declaration of Independence, is crossed by U. S. Highways 17. The plantation house was located about a quarter mile from the road and about one mile north of the meeting house. No part of the building is now standing.

Fort Morris.-- The colonial road from the Ocmulgee meeting house to Sunbury and Fort Morris traverses a primitive region of dense woods. The fort is only about 1,000 feet south of the limit of the site of Sunbury. It is a remarkably well preserved earthwork; its thick scarp walls enclose a parade of approximately one acre. The east face which overlooks the river and salt marsh is 375 feet in length, the north face, 101; the south, 111; and the west, 340. The parapet is ten feet in height and six feet above the parade. Surrounding Fort Morris is a moat, about ten foot wide at the bottom and about twenty feet at the top. It originally mounted eight guns, all of which have been removed. There is a growth of trees and shrubs on the parade and in the walls and in the ditch.

St. Catherine's Island.-- This is one of the sea islands, or "Golden Isles" of Georgia, located between Blackbeard Island to the south and Ossabaw Island to the north. Although it apparently has never been accurately surveyed, its area has been estimated at 6,500 acres. It is typical of Georgia's sea islands in that its coast is indented by a number of estuaries. Also typical is the large amount of marshland. St. Catherine's may be seen from the site of Sunbury, and to that place and island it was linked politically first in St. John's Parish and later in Liberty County.

C. Identification of Site.

Fidsmy Church is authentic beyond any reasonable doubt. The present structure, however, is not a colonial structure, the first church, built in 1768, having been burned by the British in 1778. The present church by vote of the congregation was built on the site of the earlier one in 1792. From time to time the building has been repaired, some five hundred dollars having been spent for that purpose as early as 1822. The brick wall around the historic Fidsmy graveyard dates from 1835.
Although no building in that town remains standing, the site of Sunbury is well established. An effective landmark in determining its location is Fort Norris, an earthwork easily identified because of its good condition. The site is also indicated by the old graveyard, long neglected and overgrown, but still visible. Visitors to Sunbury after its total decline have described the site. Some of these accounts are: C. C. Jones, Jr., Dead Towns of Georgia (Savannah, 1878), pp. 221-222; James Stacy, History of the Liberty Congregational Church, Liberty County, Georgia (Savannah, Georgia, 1990), p. 330; and Charles P. Jenkins, Button Cunimott, Signer of the Declaration of Independence (Garden City, New York, 1929), p. 34.

"Button Cunimott's house" on St. Catherine's Island may not have been the home of the signer. Of tabby construction, its walls are of considerable thickness and a porch extends across the front. Southeast of the house were the slave quarters, many of which now in ruins. Charles Jenkins, a careful Cunimott biographer, writes (p. 3, cited, 45):

"It is not known if this dwelling was the home of Button Cunimott, but it undoubtedly was the location of his home. There are no dates on the buildings, and no one apparently knows when they were constructed. Most of the buildings look old enough to date back to Cunimott's time, and in the absence of proof to the contrary, it is the writer's opinion that this was, at least, the site of Cunimott's home on the island of St. Catherine's.

The road (now U. S. Highwy 17) which passes by the side of the Liberty Church, is one of the oldest in Georgia, having been cut through about 1736, under the direction of Hugh Lassolley with the aid of Indians supplied by the friendly Nocatee of the Hamburg, Toco-chi-chi, to provide communication by land between Savannah and New Bern (Carolina). The latter town was an outport on the north bank of the Altamaha River, garrisoned by Scottish Highlanders brought to Georgia for the protection of the frontier. Although much of the road has been relocated, in this portion of Liberty County the pavement has been laid over the old road bed as is indicated by the position of the church in reference to it.

There can be little or no doubt that the earthwork today known as Fort Norris is indeed the Revolutionary work of that name. Its location is exactly as described in the early accounts. In 1812-1815 Fort Norris was considered a possible point of attack by the British and so some efforts were made to place it in a defensible condition. Neighboring planters furnished the labor to clean out the ditch, to strengthen the parapet, and to mount such of the guns still there that were considered in fair condition. A few light pieces, in addition, were obtained from Savannah. In a shot was fired from Fort Norris during the War of 1812, and a shot that time on the earthwork has remained without alteration or repair.

Plants of considerable size now grow on the parapet, on the parade, and in the ditch.
In the year that the Trustees for the founding of Georgia surrendered their charter to the King, some twenty years after Englishmen had landed the first of the English settlers on Yamacraw Bluff, the Hidaway settlers were established. The newcomers were a band of Puritans whose ancestors had settled in Massachusetts in the great migration of 1630, remaining there until 1670 when they moved to South Carolina and settled on the Ashley River, principally at Dorchester and Beaufort. Inasmuch as they desired a compact settlement in Carolina, they took up only small tracts of land, and it was found, with the dividing and subdividing of these small farms among successive generations, the small farms would not support them. By reason of economic necessity, many young persons were forced to leave the com-community, which in their close-knit society was more than ordinarily distressing. It was alleged by some, too, that the region around Dorchester and Beaufort was "a very sickly part of the country." Clearly, more land situated in a more favorable climate was needed if the community were to survive, so several attempts were made to locate a suitable place elsewhere in Carolina.

Failing in their efforts to find a promising land in Carolina,

\[\text{footnote 1}\]

\[\text{footnote 2}\]

1 James Stacy, History of the Hidaway Congregational Church, Liberty County, Georgia (Bowling Green, Georgia, n.d. - printed 1st ed., 1909, 2 Records of the Congregational Church, quoted in ibid., 15-16.
investigate the land at King's Ferry which had been suggested as an attractive site for establishing a new colony. The report was favorable, but the removal to Georgia being opposed by some of the congregation, another party was sent out in the following month to inspect the Midway lands. After exploring the region for about a week, this group proceeded to Savannah where they petitioned for, and received, a grant of some 20,000 acres of land to be reserved for the Carolina Puritans for a period of eighteen months. Returning home, the missionaries found opinion divided in regard to removal to Georgia, but “an inclination to remove seemed considerably in the ascendant.”

About the first of August, 1752, Georgia’s pioneer Puritans, set out six traveling by land and seven by water, to survey the land and begin the settlement at Midway. After a series of misfortunes, they returned to Carolina. The Church Records affirm “Those adverse Providences were very discouraging to most, and brought the affair of our removing to a very considerable stand.”

Notwithstanding the disheartening circumstances, the van of the new colony arrived in December, 1752, when Benjamin Baker and Samuel Bacon, with their families, began a settlement. It seems that only Parsonas May and his family arrived at Midway in 1753. In the following year, however, seventeen families, including that of the pastor, and two single men, migrated to the Georgia land and thus the permanence of the settlement became more nearly assured.

3 Church Records, in ibid., 13-17.
4 Ibid., 17.
5 Ibid., 18-19.
From year to year thereafter, other settlers took up land at Sidney. It has been estimated that when the settlement had been completely established it comprised three hundred and fifty whites and fifteen hundred negroes.

In the development of the plantations in the swamps of the Sidney district it was customary for the planter to leave his Carolina estate, with able-bodied hands, after the fall harvest and to spend the winter in clearing land and building a house. In a season or two, having prepared the way, he would bring his family and servants in the early spring and enter at once upon the cultivation of the land. Rice being the only money crop in the region, much work was entailed in the clearing, ditching, and drainage of the swamps.

With the high regard for order characteristic of the Puritans, the settlers proceeded to draw up, on August 3d, 1756, "Articles and Rules of Incorporation Agreed upon by a Society Settled upon Sidney and Newport in Georgia." The preamble, an indicator of the spirit of the people, is quoted:

We, the subscribers, settled on Sidney and Newport in Georgia, being sensible of the advantages of good order and social agreement, among any people, both for their Civil and Religious Benefits and especially its necessity among us as a Christian Society, being mostly a dissenting or congregational

7 The name of the river is given as Sidney in some of the early records. Some have held to the opinion that the district and the church were named for the river and should properly be Sidney; others, that the name of the church and district unjustly due to its central location between Savannah and Darien whereas the name of the river was properly Sidney. In view of the fact that the name Sidney has long been sanctioned by usage, it is employed throughout this report to refer to river, district, or church.

8 Charles C. Jones, Jr., The History of Georgia (New York, 1883), I, 465.
9 Charles C. Jones, Jr., The Land Names of Georgia, Collections of the Georgia Historical Society, IV (Savannah, 1870), 163-165. church, that doth not ordinarily come under all the privileges of the establishment, and being willing to lay a foundation by the blessing of God of peace and harmony among ourselves, and inoffensiveness to all our neighbors, and considering the necessity of forming ourselves into a corporation, by some certain and explicit rules and covenants, in order to obtain these good ends proposed; do accordingly come under the following articles of agreement, jointly among and with each other . . . 10

The articles which followed were simple and direct, 10 the signers pledged financial support to the church, agreed to meet annually at the church "to consult about the necessary business of the Society," and indicated that they would choose annually three or more selectmen, "immediately to manage our public business," and a clerk to keep the records of the church and society. Members of the society who were "supporters of and attenders on a gospel ministry among us," could vote on all matters, secular and ecclesiastical, brought before any meeting of the society, but on matters "more immediately respecting religion, such as judging of the soundness, orthodoxy and due qualifications of ministers . . . the members of our church in full communion . . . shall have a double vote." 11

On the first four Sundays after the arrival of the families in 1766, services had been held at private houses. Meanwhile a log house was being erected for temporary use as a church and the first sermon was preached there on June 7. There, too, on December 3, 1766 was observied a day of Thanksgiving for the "tolerable good crops this year not with-

10 Records of the Ebenezer Congregational Church, 1, 1-4. The original manuscript is in possession of the Georgia Historical Society.
Typesettled transcript of volumes 1, 3, 4, 5, 7, 8, 9, 10, and 11 and index bound in four volumes are at Hodges Hall Branch, Savannah Public Library which is also the Library of the Georgia Historical Society. (Hereafter cited as 12 Records Ebenezer Church). Also reprinted in Ebenezer, Hist. Ebenezer Church, 29-52.

11 Ibid.
standing the Disco raging. "Prospects in June,"

At a meeting of the society held on January 12, 1760, the community decided upon the location for a new meeting house, and, on September 9th, following, work on the structure was begun. The end of the year saw the completion of the church and, on January 2, 1767 the first sermon was preached there. The new church, located on the neck between the Midway and Newport rivers and immediately east of the Savannah-Darien road, was forty-four by thirty-six feet, with eighteen foot in the story, pitched roof, hipped at one end and a small steeple at the other. The steeple was placed on the west end of the meeting house with the pulpit in the north, "it being more comfortable for the minister in the heat of summer." The structure was built, for the most part, of hand-hewn cypress.

"Rich in wisdom and good citizenship," the Midway people began early to show signs of material prosperity. In the early days their trade was conducted overland via the old military road which had been built by Hugh Sackey some twenty years before to connect Savannah and Darien and upon which the meeting house of Midway had been built.
Feeling the need for a seaport, however, Midway began to work for its fulfillment, and Sunbury was the result.

In early as July 11, 1787, the attention of the society had

---

12 MB Records, Midway Church, I. 30.
13 Deale, Pvt., Midway Church, 36.
14 MB Records, Midway Church, I. 30.
15 Id., 37.
16 Deale, Pvt. Midway Church, 34-35.
17 E. S. Carter, A Brief History of Georgia (Chapel Hill, N. C., 1933), 30.
been dramatically directed to the fact that Simbury, a bluff about 10 miles due east of the meeting house, constituted the natural point of entry by water to the settlement. On that day, having been warned of the activities of privateers, a party went to Simbury, where they "raised a couple of batteries and made Carriages for eight Small 18 Cannon which were at the Place," as a further protection against depredations by Indians or other enemies during this period of the French and Indian War, the Simsbury society enclosed the meeting house within a "defence." Governor Henry Ellis, on his tour of inspection of fortifications in the southern part of the province was much pleased with those preparations.

The Simsbury people petitioned, in the early part of 1757, for 20 twenty-two acres of land to be used as a public landing place, but action was postponed until it could be determined whether or not the land was legally vacant. In June of the following year, Mark Carr conveyed three hundred acres of his five hundred acre tract on the Simsbury River, including the waterfront, in trust to five Simsbury carry sioners, to be laid out as a town by the name of Simbury, one hundred 21 acres being reserved as a common. The town of Simbury was duly laid 22 out, and enjoyed a rapid rise to commercial prosperity. As early as 1763, Simbury was declared, by Governor James Wright, a part of entry

18 13 Records, 1st Church, I, 57.
19 William Bass, Beacon, A History of Georgia from the First Discovery by Europeans to the Adoption of the Constitution 20 Allan P., " Carrier (comple.), The Colonial Records of the State of Georgia (1732-1777), VII, 388.
22 A plan of the town of Simsbury is reprinted in ibid., facing p. 141.
and Thomas Carr was appointed collector, John Martin, naval officer, and Francis Lee, surveyor. From Sunbury was shipped the rice crop from the swamp regions in its back country, the principal trade being with the West Indies and the northern colonies. The town on the Sidney became, too, the favorite "recess" for planters, including Lyman Hall, whose plantations lay in the swamp. Soon it was established as a commercial rival of the older town of Savannah.

In the same year that Sunbury was founded, the province of Georgia was divided into parishes for the encouragement of the established church. Savannah as the entire province was included in this division, the land of the Puritans of Sidney who had little in common with the Church of England was included in one of the parishes. These parishes retained their identity until the adoption, in 1777, of the first state constitution when counties were set up. The Sidney district with some adjacent islands, was given the name of the Parish of St. John. Its limits were indicated as follows:

... From Sunbury in the district of Sidney and Newborn from the southern bounds of the parish of St. Phillip, extending southward as far as the north line of Samuel Eastings, and from thence southeast to the south branch of Newborn, including the islands of St. Katherine [sic] and Baranda [now Colonel's], and from the north line of said Samuel Eastings northeast, shall be and forever continue, a parish by the name of "The parish of St. John"...

Dying between the mouths of the Sidney and Sapelo rivers.

within view of the town of Sunbury, and included in St. John's Parish, was St. Catherine's Island. In the fall of 1785, Thomas Bosworm advertised his willingness to lease that island to any interested person for a term of years together with the cattle then feeding there and the timber rights. Dutton Guinnott, then a merchant in Savannah, after due negotiations, sold his business in Savannah, and became a planter on the sea island of St. Catherine.

Guinnott's residence was in easy access to Sunbury which he often visited, on business and socially. Especially significant is his strong personal and political friendship with Lyman Hall, of that town, "the leading physician in the community, and one of the earliest and most influential 'Sons of Liberty' in the Province."

The rise in importance of the port of Sunbury made advisable the maintenance of adequate defenses. In the spring of 1780, the Legislature voted "to the Commissioners of the Parish of Saint John for the use of the Fort erected at Sunbury and for the use of the Fort erected at Cockspur in the said Parish a sum not exceeding twenty five pounds. . . ." Into in the following year, an act that provided for the erection of a fort and battery on Cockspur Island for the protection of Savannah, also appropriated one hundred pounds for the construction of a lookout and battery on Lidney River.

20 Georgia Gazette (Savannah), Oct. 26, 1785. A file of this newspaper is in the Library of the Georgia Historical Society, Savannah, Georgia.
22 James, Biographical Sketches of Col. DeLagra, 50.
23 Colonial Records of Ga., XVII, 412.
24 1830, 472-74.
inhabitants who were going to St. John's meeting, a very large and well-constructed place of worship, in St. John's parish, where I associated with them and heard a very excellent sermon delivered by their pastor, the Rev. Mr. Peeples. This respectable congregation is independent, and consists chiefly of families and proslaves to a flock which this pastor can lead, about forty years ago, from South Carolina, and settled in this fruitful district. It is about nine miles from St. Mary to Bodney Meeting-house, which stands on the high road opposite the Sunbury road. As soon as the congregation broke up I resumed my travels, proceeding down the high-road towards Port Derrington, on the Altamaha, passing through a level country well watered by large streams, branches of Bodney and Newport rivers, coursing from extensive swamps and marshes, their sources; these swamps are daily clearing and improving into large fruitful rice plantations, according to the well inhabited and rich district of St. John's parish.

It was in this period of well-being for St. John's parish that a considerable addition was made to the "Bodney Meeting House." In March, 1770, the society voted that "the gallery shall be made commodious for the white and a shed be made for the Negroes." Furthermore, it was agreed that in addition to the south side of the church "forty with about 35 feet by 20 feet, a porch, a shed, and a tree." Four years later, a parsonage was built. It was "35 feet long and 12 wide, with a porch on one side eight feet wide, the said house to be two stories with a pitch roof, three rooms and a closet above stairs and one chamber, and a press below, and likewise a kitchen 20 feet long and 12 wide with gas partition." Following the American Revolution, the minds of the inhabitants of St. John's parish, and to halt their steady rise to prosperity, were the youngest, most remote, most sparsely populated, poorest, and comparatively least important of the original thirteen was at first not

---

34 Ibid., 63-106
35 SC Records Bodney Church, I, 20-111
36 Ibid., 12.
Sunbury, with a view toward concentrating all the trade possible from the interior, was active in sponsoring that type of enterprise known in a later era as "internal improvements." In 1768, for example, a new public road was authorized from Sunbury to join the southeast road near the plantation of Samuel Hastings. At another time, it was proposed to connect 'Hibiny and North Eastport rivers by a canal between Colonel's Island and the mainland, but the plan was not put into effect.

The heyday of the port on the 'Hibiny came in the 1770s. In the year 1772, fifty-six vessels were cleared at the custom house at Sunbury. William Partrum, botanist and traveler in the southern colonies in that decade, visited Sunbury and the 'Hibiny church in 1773. He observed that Sunbury was a sea-port town beautifully situated on the main between Hibiny and Eastport rivers, about fifteen miles south of Great Clarks river. The town and harbor are defended from the fury of the sea by the north and south points of St. Helena and South Catharine's islands: between which is the bar and entrance into the sounds; the harbor is spacious and safe, and has water enough for ships of great burthen. I arrived here in the evening... one of the inhabitants... politely introduced me to one of the principal families, where I supped and spent the evening in a circle of gentle and polite ladies and gentlemen... 33

In regard to the rest of St. John's parish, Partrum wrote:

In the narrow channel to the adumbrations of my attendant spirits, curiosity, as well as to gratify the expectations of my worthy patron, 1 again set off on my southern excursion and left Sunbury in company with several of the polite

---

30 Bidde, 526-527.
31 James, Read赛区 of Co., in Collections, "a Hist. Soc., IV,166.
33 William Partrum, Travels Through North and South Carolina, Georgia East and West Florida... (London, 1778), 6. much concerned with the discontent manifested by her sister colonies to the northward. Of the obnoxious legislation of which they complained, Georgia had experienced only the Stamp Act and that had not been enforced within her borders. The latest historian of Georgia thus succinctly states the case:

Georgia had been the pet of English philanthropy and of the English Parliament; a million dollars had been expended upon her in addition to all the charity that had gone along with the founding and early development of the colony. Gratitude might well have made Georgia the last stronghold of British loyalty in America.53

In the arming of Georgia to a spirit of resistance to Great Britain, the South Carolina Planters of St. John’s parish took the lead, and among them probably the most zealous of all was Lynn Hall.
Although Mr. Hall owned a rice plantation located on the Savannah-Parke road a short distance north of the Hilby Meeting House, his residence was at Savannah. As a leading physician of the region, his influence was widespread, and he early assumed and never relinquished the stand for liberty.

The First Continental Congress, meeting in 1774, without delegates from Georgia, had adopted a non-importation agreement and had decided that another congress should meet in the following year.
The St. John’s planters watched with interest the proceedings in Savannah, hoping that Georgia’s assembly would follow the course indicated by the Continental Congress. For a variety of reasons, including the personal popularity of the governor, Sir James Wright,

37 Allen D. Cameron, The Revolutionary Records of the State of Georgia,
3 vols., (Atlanta, 1938), I. 7, Camplin’s Introduction.
38 Coulter, Georgia, 63.
39 Jones, Real Names of Ga., in Collections, Ga. Hist. Soc., IV, 173-75; Jones, Biographical Sketches of Eleazer, 3:205; The Revolutionary Records of Georgia, III, 192-94.
many Georgians later to adopt the cause of liberty were hesitant. In January, 1775, the first of a series of meetings of a body which called itself the Provincial Congress was held, but delegates from only four of the eleven parishes were present. Nothing was accomplished by this minority group. The delegates from St. John's did not take their seats in the Provincial Congress but organized themselves into a separate body. At a meeting of this "Committee of St. John's Parish" held on January 10, 1775, with James Hall presiding, the "General Association" recommended by the Continental Congress was ratified. Furthermore, a message was addressed to the Provincial Congress in which they expressed hope that the larger group would adopt the same measures.

Two days passed and no reply was received from the congress of delegates from the other parishes. Then the St. John's group again wrote in the hope that the silence had been "due rather to inattention than design." "We now assure you," the second message continued, "that if you think proper to enter fully into the measures of the late Continental Congress, we will heartily join you in every thing that may tend to enforce them."

To this communication, a reply was soon received, inviting St. John's parish to send delegates to the provincial congress. It stated, furthermore, that every delegate was accountable to his constituents and encouraged and therefore "ought not to let any other man, or set of men, judge for him." In conclusion, the answer, in—

---

40 Coulter, Georgia, 110-11.
41 Revolutionary Records of Ga., 1: Committee, as here used, refers to the whole body of delegates elected by the people of a town, district, or parish to represent them in the Provincial Congress.
42 Ibid., 54-55.
dicating that the honesty of the Provincial Congress should not, they thought, be questioned: "... we trust no member amongst us has any other object in view than the publick good."

The reaction of the St. John's Committee, led by Lyman Hall, was immediate and decisive. It decided that, inasmuch as only a minority of the parishes were represented in the body that called itself the Provincial Congress it was, in fact, not the spokesman for Georgia. The parishes not represented, according to the St. John's Committee, "are not bound by the proceedings of the said Committees acting as the Provincial Congress, although they may arrogate to themselves such a power." It was resolved, too, that "inasmuch as "the Committee of the several Parishes in Congress now sitting" had not approved and adopted the measures recommended by the Continental Congress, the delegates from St. John's could not be associated with them without violating the terms of the "general association, which they have already acceded to."

To the indignation of St. John's parish over the non-action of the Georgia Provincial Congress was added that of the province of South Carolina. The "General Committee" of that colony, on February 8, adopted and published a resolution "that we will, from henceforth, have no Trade, Commerce, Dealings, or Intercourse, with the said Colony of Georgia; but will hold them as enemies of the rights of America, and as inimical to the liberties of their country..."
Under the leadership of Hall, a meeting of St. John's parish delegates petitioned South Carolina to except that parish from the general condemnation of Georgia, and in effect suggested an alliance between South Carolina and the Georgia parish whereby the former would "allow trade and commerce to be continued to us exclusive (if you think proper) of this Province in general" subject to the Continental Association which "on our parts, we engage with all possible care to keep inviolate." Such of the independence of thought and willingness to secede from the remainder of Georgia is explained as the message continued:

We of this Parish are a body detached from the rest, by our Resolutions and Associations, and sufficiently distinct by local situation, large enough for particular notice, and have been treated as such by a particular address from the late Continental Congress; adjoining a sea-port... we are assured you will not condemn the innocent with the guilty, especially when a due separation is made between them.

Later in February, three members of the Committee for the Parish of St. John arrived in Charleston as emissaries to advocate the alliance of St. John's with South Carolina. The South Carolina Committee expressed a "high sense... of their arduous struggles in favor of the common cause of America" and lamented "their present unhappy situation." However, they did not approve the alliance, professing to believe it prohibited by the fourteenth article of the general Association, and suggested that the matter be placed before the next Continental Congress to meet in the following May.

46 Ibid., 59-61.
47 Ibid., 59-60. The delegates were Joseph Wood, Daniel Roberts, and Samuel Stevens. It is perhaps interesting to note that here we find the doctrine of succession advanced by inhabitants of St. John's parish, of New England ancestry, before the government of the United States had been established. To find South Carolina, too, at least by implication, rejecting the doctrine.

48 Ibid., 61-62.
Dr. Hall and his followers in St. John's having failed to get their parish into confederation, for two different reasons, either through the Provincial Congress of Georgia or the General Committee of South Carolina, convened a parish "congress" or mass meeting and elected a representative of the parish of St. John to the Devised Continental Congress. The choice, naturally, fell to Lyman Hall. At the time for the meeting of the Continental Congress he went to Philadelphia and was admitted to a seat. Although he was unanimously admitted, due to his anomalous position as delegate from part of a colony only, his admission was "subject to such regulations as Congress should determine relative to his voting." Until Georgia was fully represented, although he participated in debates and voted as an individual, he did not vote on questions decided by a vote of colonies.

From the time that the news of the battle of Lexington reached Savannah (May 10), the revolutionary spirit in Savannah rapidly gained momentum. In the following month a Council of Safety was set up to direct "affairs of the friends of freedom," and within a month the government had been completely taken away from Governor Wright and the colony added to the other twelve to make up the original thirteen. The Second Provincial Congress met on July 7, 1775, and this time five men were chosen to represent Georgia in the Continental Congress. They were: John Houston, Archibald Bulloch, Rev. J. J. Ashley, Noble Wadham Jones, and Lyman Hall, any three of whom would constitute a quorum.

---

40 Revolutionary Records of Ga., I., 02-03; Jones, Biographical Sketches of Colonists, etc.
50 Revolutionary Records of Ga., I., 06-67.
51 Conner, G. N., III.
On January 20, 1776, the next Provincial Congress assembled at Savannah and two weeks later chose John Houston, Archibald Bulloch, Lyman Hall, Button Gwinnett, and George Walton as delegates to the Continental Congress. Of these, Hall, Gwinnett and Walton, gained immortality by signing the revered Declaration of Independence. The Declaration was received with joy and celebration in Georgia.

"but nowhere with greater approval than in St. John’s Parish, the home of Hall and Gwinnett.

Gallant St. John’s was to suffer for her strong stand for liberty. In January, 1776, a British fleet lay at the entrance of the Savannah River and it was feared that the port of Sunbury might likewise soon be closed. The inhabitants of that town, accordingly, were enjoined by the Council of Safety to use the "utmost vigilance in watching the motions of the pilots for the harbour of Sunbury..." The regular annual meeting of the Midway Society was held in March but "few meetings of this Province being in a State of alarm; and the major part of the men of this District being at Savannah..."

In June, 1776, a number of negroes were employed to "finish in a more proper manner the intrenchments about Sunbury." This work included the building of a fort just below the town at the point where the high ground ended and the broad impracticable marshes between the main and Colonel's Island began. In the same month, Colonel James Screven was ordered to bring the cannon from Frederica, and these were

54 Ibid., 91.
55 Revolutionary Records of Co., I, 91, Minutes Council of Safety.
56 Id., Records Midway Church, I, 17.
57 Revolutionary Records of Ga., I, 126, Minutes Council of Safety.
probably mounted at the work at Sunbury, which was given the name of Fort Morris. This fortification was an enclosed earthwork, so substantial that it still stands today. The walls enclose a parade of about an acre.

For the first three years of the Revolution, the major campaigns were conducted far to the north of Georgia. That colony, however, suffered much from the incursions of the Loyalists who maintained headquarters at St. Augustine. In 1775, Sunbury was the rendezvous for the forces of General Charles Lee in his punitive expedition against East Florida. In the following year, Colonel Samuel Elbert embarked troops for Sunbury against St. Augustine.

The year 1776 brought disaster to the Midway people of old St. John's Parish, which had the previous year been given the name of Liberty County, in the organization of the state government, as a tribute to the outstanding efforts of its inhabitants in the cause of independence. Early in that year some alarm was experienced for the safety of Sunbury as indicated by an order by the Executive Council: the persons appointed on December 11, 1775, were to "be required with the utmost expedition to complete the Battery and other public works in Sunbury..." In the following month, it appeared "that there is reason to apprehend an attempt by the enemy is intended against the town of Sunbury." Defiant measures, accordingly, were adopted for the defense of the town: it was left to the discretion of the commanding officer

60 Coulter, Georgia, 126.
in Liberty County whether he would march the militia under his command with the Continental troops or keep them for the defense of Savannah, in either case leaving enough men at the town to run the gallies there; it was ordered, too, that twelve 6-pound shot be delivered from the arsenal for the use of Savannah.

The blow was struck in November, 1778. The reduction of Savannah was a part of Lord George Germain's carefully planned Southern campaign of 1778. General Robert Howe was then holding Savannah, and in an attempt to distract his attention to the southern part of the state, General Augustin Prevost was ordered to send out from St. Augustine, two expeditions. One of these, traveling by water was to make a direct attack on Savannah; the other, by land, was to march through lower Georgia, laying waste the countrycide, joining the other force at Savannah, whose both would proceed to Savannah, to assist Colonel Archibald Campbell who was sailing from New York with 2,000 men.

Accordingly, General Prevost sent by water a detachment of infantry and light artillery under the command of Lieutenant Colonel L. V. Fassar for the capture of Savannah. Lieutenant Colonel Mark
Prevost was to lead the land force of 100 British regulars and 300 Indians and Scotholites, the latter being a group of Tories and 66 malcontents assembled by a South Carolina Tory named Scotholite.

On December 17, three deserters from the Florida forces brought the disquieting news to Sidney that Col. Prevost's force was approaching. Two days later, the British column entered Georgia and began a program of destruction. At the point where the Savannah-Darien road crosses Bulloch Swamp, Provoost's force was confronted by Colonel John Baker and a hastily assembled group of mounted militia men. After a short skirmish, the Americans fell back. Col. Baker, Captain Cooper, and William Goulding were wounded.

At North Newport bridge (later Nicoboro bridge) the Whig forces again vainly attempted to stop the advance toward Midway.

On the morning of November 20, Col. Eben White, in command of the Midway fortifications, was joined by Brigadier General James Scriver, accompanied by twenty militia men. It was resolved to abandon the defensive position at Midway Meeting House and take up another about a mile and a half in the direction of the army where the Darien road passed through a thick wood. Provoost had apparently selected the same position previously and the two forces reached the spot almost simultaneously, neither having time to take up a strong position. In the action that followed, Gen. Scriver was mortally wounded.

Col. White fell back to Midway Church, breaking bridges as he retired across the causeway. Abandoning the meeting house, he then proceeded in the direction of Great Crossroads Ferry where he added his troops to the American forces already there and took up a strong position. Col. Provoost pursued only about six or seven miles.
in the direction of Savannah, Fuser had not arrived at Sunbury; the Americans had thrown up a breastwork on the Ogeechee and so Provost did not push on but rather decided to return to St. Augustine.

Upon the approach of the British force, the "Neighbourhood of Bidewy fled from their Habitations" most of them going to the encampment on the Ogeechee. Now, as Provost withdrew to Florida he burned almost all of the houses in the community, also not sparing the crops. The Bidewy meeting House, too, the pride of the inhabitants of the region and the center of their life, was burned to the ground. Thus did Bidewy pay the price for her adherence to the principles of liberty.

Sunbury, however, had not yet fallen. Fuser, delayed by headwinds, did not arrive before Sunbury until Provost had begun his retreat and was beyond the reach of communications. Late in November, his vessels anchored off Colonel's Island, and there landed his infantry and artillery. The field pieces were trained on Fort Morris and up the Bidewy River moved the armed vessels to a position in front of the fort.

Fort Morris was held at this time by Colonel John McIntosh with 127 Continental troops together with some British and citizens of Sunbury, numbering less than 200 in all, Fuser made the following demand upon Col. McIntosh for the surrender of the fort:

---

71 Ibid., 8.
72 Ibid., 20; Bidewy Church, I., 36, November 20, 1776.
73 Ibid., I., 12; 41.
74 Ibid., 41.
75 Ibid., 56; Jones, Address of Bidewy, 22.
SIR,

You cannot be ignorant that four armies are in motion to reduce this Province. One is already under the guns of your fort, and may be joined, when I think proper, by Colonel Prevost who is now at the Locust meeting-house. The resistance you can, or intend to make, will only bring destruction upon this country. On the contrary, if you will deliver me the fort which you command, lay down your arms and remain neutral until the fate of America is determined, you shall, as well as all of the inhabitants of this parish, remain in peaceable possession of your property. Your answer, which I expect in an hour's time, will determine the fate of this country, whether it is to be laid in ashes, or remain as above proposed.

I am Sir,

Your most obedient, etc.,

L. V. FUSER

Colonel 60th Regiment and Commander of his Majesty's Troops in Georgia, on his Majesty's Service.

P.S.

Since this letter was closed, some of your people have been firing scattering shot about the lines. I am to inform you, that if a stop is not put to such irregular proceedings, I shall burn a house for every shot so fired.

Colonel McIntosh promptly sent Col. Fuser the following spirited reply:

FORT MARTIN, Nov. 25, 1776

SIR,

We acknowledge we are not ignorant that your army is in motion to endeavour to reduce this State. We believe it entirely chimerical that Colonel Prevost is at the Meeting-House: but should it be so, we are in no degree apprehensive of danger from a junction of his army with yours. We have no property compared with the object we contend for that we value a spark; — and would rather perish in a vigorous defense than accept of your proposals. We, Sir, are fighting the battles of America, and therefore disdain to remain neutral till its fate is determined. As to surrendering the Fort, receive this laconic reply: "GIVE AND TAKE IT."

I have the honor to be Sir,

Your most obedient Servant,

JOHN McINTOSH

Colonel of Continental Troops.

---

77 Reprinted in ibid., 130-03.
Instead of immediately beginning the attack on Fort Morris,
Huger waited for word from scouts he had sent out to ascertain Provençal's position. Since he found that the latter, after his raid on St. Mary, had withdrawn to Florida, Huger raised the siege of Fort Morris, re-embarked his troops and returned to the St. John's River where they met the returned forces of Provençal.

Although the St. Mary region was free of enemy troops, in December, 1778, it had been left in a deplorable condition. Pathetically, the refugees who had gone to the Ogeechee came back home to view the ruins. Many were undecided whether to return to their plantations and attempt to restore the fruits of the years of labor which had been eaten away or to go to South Carolina to settle.

In December, 1778, Savannah fell into the hands of Col. Campbell;
Horne's army retreating with great confusion and considerable loss, crossed the Savannah River at Ester's and Zubly's ferries and assembled in South Carolina, thus leaving the state of Georgia open to the British forces. On the retreat, Horne had paused long enough to send orders to Major Joseph Lane, then commanding Fort Morris, to evacuate, retire up the south side of the Ogeechee, and join the main force at Zubly's ferry. Major Lane, however, determined to defend Savannah at whatever cost, disregarded the orders of his superior and remained at his post.

70 Ibid., 182; Jones, Address at St. Mary, 10.
79 ES Records, St. Mary Church, I, 412.
80 Jones, Dead Towns of Georgia, Collections, 10, Hist. Soc. IV, 194-95.
Major Lane was later tried by court martial and dismissed from the service (Ibid., 152 n). It was the opinion of Gen. William Foultrie that since "notwithstanding his receiving positive orders for that purpose he Don Quixote-like, thought he was strong enough to withstand the whole force the British had in Georgia, for which,
I think, he deserves to be hanged." — Memoirs of the American Down in Florida, General Augustine Prevost, having heard of the capture of Savannah by Col. Campbell, left St. Augustine with an army of about two thousand men, for the purpose of joining him. On the way, Prevost stopped at Sunbury, and after three days of maneuvering into position for the investment of Fort Morris, on January 9, demanded its surrender. Major Lane, at first refuse[d] and attempted a defense, but soon finding his position untenable in opposition to superior numbers and artillery, he was compelled to make an unconditional surrender of the entire garrison of seventeen commissioned officers and one hundred and ninety-five non-commissioned officers and privates together with a considerable quantity of stores and ammunition. The American losses were one captain and three privates killed, and seven wounded; those of the British, one private killed and three wounded.

The Midway region of Liberty County, last part of all Georgia to be surrendered to the British, now was subjected to a strict military regimen. Fort Morris was renamed by the conquerors, Fort George in honor of the sovereign against whom the American states were contending. Nothing worthy of mention occurred at Midway during the remainder of the war; matters there continued in an "exhausted and comparatively quiet condition."

On July 11, 1783, the British, in view of the advancing columns of General Anthony Wayne, evacuated Savannah after having been in possession of it more than four and one-half years, thus freeing Georgia.

---

from British rule. The effects of the war had been disastrous to Georgia. The slave population was decentralized and reduced, "plantations burned and converted into waste places, and the seeds of poverty and distress soon broadcast."

With the ending of peace, many who had been serving in the army or who had fled before the advance of the British troops, returned to their homes in the Hickory District of Liberty County, to undertake the Titanic task of reconstruction. Some did not return, having died or settled permanently elsewhere, and so the region lost considerably in population. With considerable and characteristic energy, the people of Hickory, however, proceeded to remedy their shattered fortunes as well as possible.

There was at this time a decided effort to re-establish Sunbury as a place of importance. One phase of this is indicated in "An Act Fixing and Establishing Court Houses and Jails, and the Fixing and Regulating Elections in the Different Counties of the State," which was passed on February 26, 1834. This act established Sunbury as the county seat of Liberty County and provided for the erection there of a court house and jail. The town, however, never quite regained its ante bellum importance. True, in 1835, Sunbury Academy was incorporated and became the most famous institution of learning in southern Georgia, and as late as 1851 an optimistic observer expressed the opinion that Sunbury promised without doubt to become "a port of commercial consequence." However, as early as 1797 it had been apparent that the population of the town was steadily decreasing, and accordingly the county seat was removed to Fishers. The last vessel of any consequence to visit the port of Sambury was a Swedish brig which, in 1824, carried a cargo of cotton from that place. The decline of Sambury became absolute, all traces of the town passing away. As long ago as 1806, a visitor to the site was moved to write a few years later: "Like Pompeii of old, the whole now lies buried beneath the ashes of years, but unlike Pompeii, utterly beyond the hope of future resurrection."

Soon after the return of the Nantucket people to their homes, in 1796, the question of the erection of a new meeting house naturally arose. The first problem was one of location; whether the new church should be built at the place where the former one stood "or on some place more central." The question seemed to be one between practicality and sentiment; if so, the continentalists were victorious for it was decided by the narrowest possible margin— a vote of 15 to 14—that the new church should be built on the ground where it stood.

The matter of location decided, there arose the more vexing problem, to those un-enlightened churchmen, of financing... the construction of the new house of worship. A meeting of the society, held on July 28, 1754, it was decided that a "con account house" which would be forty feet long and thirty feet wide, constructed of posts in the ground, filled up with poles would serve temporarily until a more permanent structure could be built.
It was found necessary in the following year to build an addition of twelve feet to the east side and a shelter of the same width on the south end for the negroes. The parchment was erected in 1760.

Under the direction and guidance of the young Rev. Abiel Holmes, the spiritual life and community activities of the Hidsey society revived. The Library Society, one of the institutions of happier days, was restored with the pastor as president.

In 1790, six years after the erection of the "congress" meeting house, the question of a larger and more suitable church was considered. The building was not built until two years later; it in the church that still stands at Hidsey.

Notable indeed has this community been in the production of outstanding leaders in many fields and sound citizenship among her inhabitants in general. The lasting fame of the people of Hidsey rests in her contribution to American liberty, a spirit epitomized by Colonel John McIntosh when facing possible death.

90 Ibid., 1, 19. Map of seats shown in Ibid., 1, 20.
91 Ibid., 30.
92 RS Records Hidsey Church, 30.
93 Ibid., 34, Hidsey Church, 30. See also photograph facing ded; ication page.
94 For the most comprehensive list and short sketches of those and evaluation of the effect of their belief on character, see Stacy, List, Hidsey Church, passim.
he answered the British commander: "We have no property compared with the object we contend for that we value a rush! -- and would rather perish in a vigorous defense than accept of your proposals. No Sir, are fighting the battles of America, and therefore disdain to remain neutral. . . . As to surrendering the fort. . . .
SOLD AND TURN IT."

BIBLIOGRAPHY

MANUSCRIPT

Original manuscript in possession of the Georgia Historical Society, Savannah, Georgia. Typewritten transcripts of volumes 1, 3, 4, 5, 7, 8, 9, 10, and 11 and index, bound in four volumes, are at Beacham Hall Branch, Savannah Public Library, which is also the Library of the Georgia Historical Society.

In addition to records of marriages, births and deaths, pew rentals, subscriptions, minutes of the transactions of the church and society and the like, certain enlightening letters and journal entries appear. A thorough digest of these records, incomplete though they be, is indispensable to an understanding of the history of the religious minority.

SELECTED REFERENCES

Vol. VII. Proceedings of the President and Assistants from October 15th, 1775, to October 30, 1783 (1904).

Vol. VIII, Continued from Mar. 8, 1780 to Dec. 31, 1782. (1907).

Vol. XVIII, Statutes enacted by the Royal Legislature of Georgia from its first session in 1733 to 1785 (1910).

Vol. XIX, Pt. II, Statutes, Colonial and Revolutionary, 1774 to 1803 (1911).

These are official records, transcribed and printed by authority of the State Legislature. For the most part, the originals are in the State Archives or in the British Public Record Office.

Georgia Revolutionary muster rolls and military records.

Volume II: "Journals of the Executive Council, from January 14, 1778, to January 6, 1782" and "Journal of the Land Court from April 6 to July 26, 1782."

A compilation of abstracts of official county records of marriages, licenses, bonds, deeds, etc., 1783-1865. Valuable for an intensive study of history.

B. Miscellaneous Source Material:

1. Partridge, William, Travels through North and South Carolina, Georgia, East and West Florida, the Bermudas, Florida, the extensive territories of the Spaniards in Great Britain, and the Country of the Spanish Captains; with an Account of the Soil and Natural Productions of those Regions, with Observations on the manners of the Indians. Dublin: Croce, Jones, Harker, Hirst, and Rice, 1798.

The travels of an observer and botanist in the years 1775 to 1777 are described in this work. His impressions of Sumter and vicinity are shown on pages 12 and 13 of this report.

A transcription of an order book of Gen. Albort in possession of the Georgia Historical Society. Transcribed by William Harden, librarian of the society, and published through the generosity of Mr. and Mrs. Jones Colenso. It is valuable source material for a study of the Revolution in Georgia.

3. Georgia Gazette, 1763-1778. A file of this Savannah newspaper is at Dodge, all Savannah Public Library (Library of the Georgia Historical Society).

Consists, for the most part, of copies of inscriptions on stones in historic Georgia cemeteries, and as such may be regarded as source material. A selection from the stones in the vicinity graveyard appears on pp. 507-645, and those in the neglected cemetery at Sumter, pp. 440-452.

Scholarly biography of Gwinnett. Contains source material in a section entitled "Contributions to American History: Papers relating to the Gwinnett-McIntosh Affair" (pp. 205-235), including letters from Robert Ross, Button Gwinnett, George Walton, Lyman Hall, and Adam McIntosh, and public records of Georgia. Contains also photograph (1925) of the old tabby plantation house on Catherine Island (facing p. 30) and one of the same date of the ruins of the slave quarters there.

2. Jones, Charles C., Jr., Address delivered at Midway Meeting House in Liberty County, Georgia, on the Second Wednesday in March, 1918, on the occasion of the laying of the corner stone of a monument to be erected in honor of the founders of Midway Church and congregation. Augusta Chronicle Publishing Co., 1918. 10 pp.

Due to the recognized standing of Jones as an historian of Georgia, this address has more value as a source of information than do most speeches of its type. Care must be more said, however, to separate the factual material from sheer oratory.

A trustworthy, though undocumented, series of biographical sketches by one of Georgia's most prolific historians. The sketches of Nathan Frazier (pp. 11-13), Button Gwinnett (pp. 49-57), Lyman Hall (pp. 86-106), George Walton (pp. 152-156) and Joseph Wood (pp. 202-205) are especially pertinent to a study of Midway.

A reliable secondary account of Sunbury from its founding to its decline and disappearance. Partially documented. A plan of the town of Sunbury (facing p. 141) and of Fort Dorset (facing p. 131) are of value in a study of the Midway community.

An extensive topographical study of the period 1849-1860, which obviously is now out of date insofar as the description of the appearance of the Revolutionary sites is concerned. A brief, undistinguished, secondary account of the reduction of Fort Norris appears in Vol. II, p. 733.

The most detailed account of the reduction of Fort Norris appears in this work. McCall has long been accepted as the outstanding authority for the Revolutionary period in Georgia, but recent investigations have shown major inaccuracies in his work.

This early account of the Hickeys Church may well have considerable value in a study of the church and society. Story, in his History of the Hickeys Congregational Church (1930), makes rather extensive use of this Volume IX of Georgia pamphlets. Unfortunately it has been lost from the Library of the Georgia Historical Society, and the pamphlet is very rare.

The scope and character of this short secondary account is indicated in its title.

A completely documented study of the settlement and influence of the Puritan society at Hickeys. The emphasis is on the sociological impact of the community in the history of Georgia as a whole.

A church history written at the turn of the century by the pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Bowman, Ga. The author had a great sentimental attachment to Midway which colorless accounts for a tendency toward mixing a considerable amount of eulogy and theology with his history. On the whole, however, it provides a rather extensive fund of information in Midway, and the author seems to have used the manuscript records of the church quite freely. The most important of several documents reproduced in the book is "The Articles and Rules of Incorporation Agreed upon by a Society Settled upon Midway and founded in Georgia, 29th of August, 1757" (pp. 23-24).

A photograph of the Midway Church faces the dedication page, and a map showing the parishes of Georgia in 1760 faces page 25. Chapter VIII (pp. 232-240) comprises a brief, but fairly good, account of Midway. The work is partially documented, and a rather lengthy number of errors is shown in the preface to the revised edition.

This old historical work is now sometimes disregarded, but in the main it seems fairly accurate and is drawn principally from manuscripts loaned to the author by the Georgia Historical Society and other organizations and individuals. In Volume 1, pp. 378-384, is a chapter entitled "Settlement of Liberty County," a good account of the arrival of the Puritans of Dorchester and Peach Hill, South Carolina, to Midway and the establishment of the settlement there.

A very good general account of the history of Georgia. Valuable in placing the Midway society in its proper perspective as regards the history of the state as a whole. A good photograph of Midway Postmaster House faces p. 90.
Conclusions together with complete evaluation of site.

The group of sites known collectively as Midway are most properly placed in Theme VI, "The War for American Independence" as classified by the National Park Service (Memoandum of July 6, 1937).

Although no major engagement of the American Revolution occurred there, Georgia's participation in the struggle is identified with this community. The lead taken by Midway (St. John's Parish) in determining and directing the allegiance of Georgia in the days before the beginning of hostilities has been treated in the historical narrative of this report. Perhaps the easiest course the Georgians of that time could have taken would have been to ally themselves with Loyalist east Florida. Had not St. John's Parish, lying between Savannah and the Florida border taken such a strong stand for liberty, it is difficult to imagine in which direction the delicately balanced loyalty of Georgians would have swung.

As it happened the Puritans of Midway, led by Dr. Lynn Hall, led the way to Georgia's becoming the thirteenth of the Original Thirteen Colonies. The devotion shown in the early days never wavered in St. John's Parish, although her field were laid waste; her plantations burned and even her beloved meeting house, burned.

Of the three signers of the Declaration of Independence from Georgia, two (Lynn Hall and Button Gurinett) were residents of St. John's Parish. Fort Morris was the scene of the heroic resolve of Col. John Holbrooke, who, in his reply to a demand for the surrender of the fort, sent that typically American answer, which deserves to live with other ringing historic challenges: "Come and take it!"

As a military site, Midway could have little value. When Savannah was taken, Savannah had already fallen into the hands of Col. Archibald Campbell. The fate of the state of Georgia had already been determined, before Fort Morris, last military post in Georgia to surrender, fell before the army of a British force which outnumbered the defenders ten to one. It is, however, of considerable interest and inspiration of the place best exemplifying the spirit of American Independence in Georgia, and is the most fitting place in the state for the commemoration of Georgia's Signers.

The site is of considerable importance, too, in relation to Theme V, "The Development of the English Colonies, 1700-1783." Georgia had from the beginning welcomed migrations of diverse nationality and religious denomination, such as the Calverts, the Burwians, the Scotch Highlanders, and others, not to mention Englishmen of the Established Church. The coming of the Puritans, American-born, to settle the Midway district 1760-66, was the last of the wholesale migrations and provided Georgia with a new and most valuable, population element.
Museum development would be desirable to interpret the Puritan influence in Georgia which centered at Midway, and to illustrate the part taken by the area in the American Revolution. These themes are closely related, because of the fact that it was largely the Puritan principles of the Midway people and their sympathy for the inhabitants of Massachusetts, the original American homeland of their ancestors, that moved them to take their strong stand for liberty.

Such a museum, to be most accessible, should be located at or near the point where the old Sumbury road joins the Atlantic Coastal Highway (U. S. 17). There could be exhibited items illustrating the life of the Puritan community, perhaps a model of the colonial meeting house which was burned in 1776, material relating to the lives of the Georgia Signers of the Declaration of Independence (Hall, Gwinnett and Walton), Revolutionary ordnance, material on Sumbury and Fort Dorris, and exhibits relating in general to the American Revolution in Georgia. The present meeting house itself stands as a museum exhibit; being built on the site of the older church when the United States of America under the Constitution was in its third year. The Midway cemetery, too, in the churchyard is of historical interest. On the west side of the church is the highway, at this point part of the old Savannah-Georgia military road built by Hugh MacKay. Ten miles east, and fairly accessible, is another museum object, Fort Dorris, Revolutionary earthwork.
II. PART B DATA

A. Ownership - Sidby Meeting House - probably owned by the Tidway Society. Fort Morris - A tract of 176 acres, including the site of Fort Morris owned by B. A. Caldon, whose post office address is Dorchester, Georgia.
Sidby - Major part of the site owned by Joseph B. Jones Florida, Florida. The following advertisement appeared recently in the Savannah Morning News: "100 Acres, Part of Historic old town of Sidby on Ogeechee river; high, level and heavily wooded; the outlook is over St.
Catherine's Sound, one of the finest on the coast; about 1,000 acres of marsh goes with it. R. L. Cooper, 3-1871."
(C. L. Cooper is a real estate agent of Savannah).
St. Catherines Is. owned by "J. J. Joyce Estate.

B. Appraised Value - This has proved impossible to ascertain due to the indeterminate boundaries of Tidway." In general, the undeveloped swamp land constituting the lyon rail plantation would be of little value; the high land on the site of Sidby probably would be worth about $70 an acre; St. Catherine's Island was sold in recent years for $700,000. Probably no monetary value would be placed on the Tidway Meeting House and cemetery and the property in not assessed for purposes of taxation.

C. Condition, Including Previous Development - The Tidway Meeting House, constructed in 1735, has been kept in good condition by succeeding generations of members of the church and society. Thus no treatment in the field of restoration has been undertaken nor is any necessary. The Georgia Society of Colonial Dames has placed a tablet on the wall of the graveyard to "commemorate the virtues and valor of the settlers of old Tidway." Also, in the cemetery of the Tidway churchyard is a large monument, thirty feet in height and thirty foot square at the base, erected by the United States Government in honor of the generals of the Revolutionary War who are buried there. The monument honors
Brigadier General Joseph Gwin who died from wounds received in a skirmish with the British near Ridgway March, 1778, and Brigadier General Daniel Kirkland, a great-grandfather of President Theodore Roosevelt. The inscription follows:

PLAQUED BY THE CONGRESS OF THE
UNITED STATES
AS A NATIONAL TRIBUTE TO BRIGADIER GENERALS
JOSEPH GWIN AND DANIEL KIRKLAND

[Signature]

407
1769

SAVED
TO THE MEMORY
OF
REV. M. G. W. GILL, MINISTER OF WORSHIP AT SUNBURY.
HE DIED IN THE 32ND YEAR OF THE SUNDAY
DAY OF NOVEMBER, 1773.
HE DIED
IN THE 24TH DAY OF NOVEMBER, 1773.
FROM FEAR OF THE WOUNDS OF THE WAR.

Gen. Oglethorpe was not wounded at Sunbury, but at a point on the Savannah-Arlie road, about a mile and a half south of Nolichucky Meeting House, some eleven or twelve miles west of Sunbury.

1776

SAVED
TO THE MEMORY
HON. JOHN DAVIES, ESQ.,
A SIGNED OF THE REVOLUTION, AND AN OFFICER NURSED FOR BRITISH IN THE INDIAN WARS.

In front of the church (south) at the intersection of T. S.
Highway 417 and the old Sunbury road is a marker of Standard AHS (Atlantic Coastal Highway) markers, as follows:

ROAD TO CAPE HENRY 1776 CONSTRUCTED IN 1776.
DUTCH AT SUNBURY
1734
DUTCH AT SUNBURY
1734

ROAD TO CAPE HENRY 1730

A short distance north of the Meeting House, on the west side of the highway, is a similar marker, which bears the following legend:
LYMAN HALL PLANTATION

1776

HOME OF DR. LYMAN HALL, (BOTH CONNECTICUT, 1724), SIEGE OF DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE. HILL DESTROYED BY BRITISH IN 1776.
PAVING FOR CULTIVATION OF FIELD.

On the highway about a mile and a half south of the Ridgley Meeting House in another 1/2 mile which reads as follows:

LYMAN HILL

DATED: JUNE 22, 1776.

CENTRAL JAME S SCOTT WAS BRICK ALLIED APPEARED TO SIEGE RIDGE HOUSE UNDER BRITISH REVIEW FROM WHICH HE CAME.

The British officer involved in this skirmish was Lieutenant Colonel John Proctor. General Augustine Proctor was then at St. Augustine, Florida.

On the countyscape of Fort Morris, facing the Rideley River, has been placed a bronze tablet 10 inches long by 30 inches wide, bearing the inscription "LYMAN HILL" and a brief history of the fort. It is a 30 marker, cast by students of the Georgia School of Technology, Atlanta. The tablet was unveiled and dedicated, with appropriate ceremonies on July 4, 1936. [See Savannah Evening News, July 5, 1936, p. 14, col. 5]

A memorial tablet for Sunbury has been placed. [See Savannah
Evening News, June 10, 1936]

The present condition of the Lyman Meeting House is excellent. Fort Morris, although trees have grown out of the house, is a remarkably well preserved Revolutionary building, probably the best preserved in Georgia, and possibly in the entire lower South. St. Catherines Island is a valuable asset. The Lyman Hall Plantation has reverted to unimproved swampland. The site of Sunbury shows no trace of a town having once been there.

[Note: Including past, present and probable future. The Lyman Meeting House received and is receiving repairs. There is no reason to believe that this will not continue as long as the Lyman Society, still an active association, is in existence.
The Lyman Hall Plantation appears to have received no care whatever; the house has entirely disappeared. The same may be said of Sunbury. Fort Morris, although neglected since 1915-1918 when an salvage was made to put it in defensible condition, appears to need little or no care in order that it may be preserved. There is a possibility that, if it passed into the hands of some zealous society for whom historical associations mean nothing, the structures might be leveled, the ditch filled, and the site converted into a cultivated field. The road from Lyman Church to Sunbury and Fort] Terris is passable but, especially the five miles at the eastern end, is in poor condition. There is nothing to indicate that repairs to this road are contemplated.

F. Accessibility— The Lidyay Meeting House is highly accessible by automobile as it is located on paved U. S. Highway 17, the Atlantic Coastal Highway, extensively used by tourists from the northeastern part of the country in going to or returning from Florida. The section of the road at this point has been laid over the colonial road built by Hugh Lidyay. On the west side of the road, a short distance north of the meeting house, is the Lyman Hall plantation the turn-off is indicated by a marker. About a mile and a half south of the meeting house, on the highway, is Spencer Hall, the site of the skirmish in which Brigadier General James Scroven was mortally wounded.

At the Lidyay Meeting House, a sand road turns off east. This is the old road that leads to Sumbury and Fort Morris and, although it is rough in places and the sand is extremely deep in others, it is passable for automobiles. About ten miles from the meeting house, the road ends at the Lidyay River. Here was the site of Sumbury and about three hundred yards south is Fort Morris.

St. Catherine's Island, privately owned and not open to the public, is highly inaccessible. There is no bridge or ferry to the island.

G. Feasibility of preservation—Probable cost of repair—Probable cost of maintenance—Possibility of income from fees or other charges—At Sumbury and Lyman Hall plantation there is no possibility of preservation, the original structures having all disappeared. At Fort Morris, repairs to the walls and embrasures of the work and the cleaning out of the moat would require, for the most part, only unskilled labor and could be effected at low cost. Sufficed repairs to the road to make it more possible while preserving its original character, should not exceed $4,000. The meeting house is now in an excellent state of preservation; no repairs seem immediately necessary. The probable cost of annual maintenance of the Lidyay Group (Lidyay Meeting House, Fort, Sumbury, and the Lidyay-Sumbury road) would not in excess of $100 unless some restoration were done and the maintenance of those structures were included in the estimate. There seems to be no possibility of any income from fees or other charges, unless a museum should be established to which a small admission fee might be charged.

H. Proposed development, including recommended boundaries—In consideration of the desire of the R. N. C. to place the house on St. Catherine's Island as the home of British Guiana, together with the inaccessibility of the island and its extremely high valuation, it is suggested that that island be omitted from any program of physical development. The Lidyay Meeting House would be the center of the developed area, with existing roads north to Lyman Hall plantation, south to Spencer Hall, and east to Sunbury and Fort Morris.

It is suggested that the Kinsey group (Kinsey Meeting House, Spencer Hill, Fyler Mill, Kinsey Lane, Kinsey, and Fort Morris) be designated a Revolutionary memorial, commemorating the part taken by Georgia in that struggle.

At or near the Kinsey Meeting House (at the junction of U. S. Highway 17 and the old Sunbury road) a museum developing the Puritan Revolution in Georgia theme (as suggested in I, 7, this report), should be established. At this place, attention of the visitors could be directed to other historic sites in the vicinity, relevant to the Kinsey story.

As illustrating Georgia's part in the American Revolution, and, inasmuch as it is without any great national significance, this site, it is believed, should be developed by the State.

V. Relationship of site to areas already in National Park Service.

Kinsey group is related, in general and rather remotely, to all sites connected with the War for American Independence, and more particularly to those involved in the Southern Campaign. There is, however, no very close relationship between Kinsey and any of the areas administered by the National Park Service.

Perhaps it is most closely associated with Fort Frederica National Monument, for it was from that place (then Fort San Trovaso) that the expeditions under Lieut. Col. Drury Provost and Lieut. Col. E. V. Fucer, and later that under Gen. Augustine Provost, proceeded. It is thought, too, that some of the guns of Fort Frederica were taken to Sunbury and mounted there.

III. Maps. The following maps have been included in Appendix A.

1. The Parishion of Georgia, 1760-1777.
2. Plan of the Town of Sunbury.
3. Plan of Fort Morris, showing Kinsey River and the march to the east of the fort.
4. State Highway Department of Georgia, corrected as of July 2, 1969.
5. Corps of Engineers, U. S. Army, Tactical Map *Georgia, *Mount Vernon Quadrangle (Carroll, Hinds Index 2600/6700; 40; Tactical Index 700-5-11-1/2)

IV. Photographs. The following photographs in Appendix B.

1. View from Fort Morris, looking east. (Taken from a point about 300 yards south of Sunbury, it is also illustrative of the view from that place.
2. The face of Fort Morris in 1866.
3. Battery Meeting House and Cemetery from the south, showing the country road in foreground.
4. Battery Meeting House from the southeast.

Respectfully submitted:

James W. Holland,
Junior Park Historian,
St. Pulaski National Monument.

Approved:

Raleston B. Lattimore,
Acting Superintendent,
Fort Pulaski National Monument.

APPENDIX A

TABS AND PLANS

The State Highway Map of Georgia andimerick Quadrangle, Engineer Corps, U. S. A., included in the original and first copy are missing from this copy.
PARISHES OF GEORGIA.

The State was laid off into 8 parishes in 1788, viz.: St. Paul, St. George, St. Matthew, Christ Church, St. Philip, St. John, St. Andrew and St. James. Four others were added in 1796, viz.: St. David, St. Patrick, St. Thomas and St. Marys.

From James W. Tracy, "History of the Arabian Congregational Church, Liberty County, Georgia," p. 28.
Fort Morris

From Charles E. Jones, Jr., "Land Grants of Georgia" (Collections of the Georgia Historical Society, 1897), p. 101.
APPENDIX B

PHOTOGRAPHS

The two views of Midway I-oting House, included in the original and first copy are missing from this copy.
VIEW FROM FORT NEREN
Looking west out over the enclosures from a point near the counterguard.

FORT NEREN
The visitors are walking in the wood, facing the scarp wall of the earthenworks.
UDIES LONGEVITY OF MIDWAY'S DEAD

Historical Quarterly Presents Varied Articles

Midway Cemetery is the subject of a statistical study by Roland M. Harper in the current issue of the Georgia Historical Quarterly. The article contains notes on members of the Midway community buried elsewhere. Mr. Harper refers to a pamphlet called "Some Early Epitaphs in Georgia," published in 1924 by Eugenia M. Johnston and others, from which he obtained the basic data for a study of Savannah vital statistics in the quarter in 1931. Because of the limited scope of "Some Early Epitaphs," which made it of little use for calculations of longevity at Midway, he has obtained all the available records of the cemetery for this new study of longevity of the Midway community from 1800 to 1880. A chart illustrates the average ages at death, in the Midway Cemetery. The average length of life for 300 persons was 35.8. The figures are analyzed in detail and make a very interesting study. In a footnote, Mr. Harper calls attention to the fact that less than half the Confederate soldiers buried in Midway have their graves dated, often the only marker being the U. D. C. iron cross. Undated Confederate graves are common in other places, he points out.

The list of Midway members buried elsewhere is an interesting and often distinguished one, containing many names well known in Savannah, such as Bacon, Gay, Harden, Maxwell, Jones, Law, Quarterman, Myrick, Ward and Winn.

This issue of the quarterly continues the papers by the late Ulrich Bonnell Phillips on "The Course of the South to Secession." It also contains the first section of an article by Louise Blue in Hill on "Governor Brown and the Confederacy." This section on notes and documents contains papers relating to the Georgia-Florida frontiers, and "Two Augusta For Bills."
FT. MORRIS AND SUNBURY VISITS

ATTRACTION

Archaeologists Are to See Them This Week

An important part of the program arranged for the meeting of the Society for Georgia Archaeology in Savannah, May 6 and 7, will be a trip to old Fort Morris and to the "lost" town of Sunbury, both near Midway, about 15 miles south of the city.

The excursion will take place in the afternoon of May 7, following an inspection of the WPA excavations at Irene Mounds.

Both Fort Morris and Sunbury played a notable part in the early history of Georgia, particularly during the War of Independence. The flag that flew over the fort in 1778 was the last American flag to be hauled down when the state was overrun by the British. Nearby Sunbury, nothing remains to show that this town, formerly a port of entry, was once a commercial rival of Savannah.

In view of the interest shown by the people of Savannah in the coming meeting of the Society for Georgia Archaeology, the following brief outline, concerning the nature and history of the two sites, is given:

The once thriving town of Sunbury was located close to the mouth of the Midway river, in Liberty County. It lay only 10 miles from the present town of Midway, for which it was established, in 1738, as a much needed seaport. Sunbury rapidly became prosperous, the harbor was packed with shipping, and was made a regular port of entry only a short time after its founding.

With the outbreak of the American Revolution, Sunbury whole-heartedly endorsed the American cause and with Midway became a center of patriotic enthusiasm. It is significant that Dr. Lyman Hall and Button Gwinnett, two of the three Georgia delegates to the First Continental Congress, were closely associated with this town.

Fort Morris, named after an officer in the Continental army, was built in 1776, for the defense of Sunbury. It lay only a few hundred yards southwest of the town, comprising thick walls surrounded by a moat, and an enclosed parade ground about an acre in extent. The fort was used as a base for local operations during most of the war and was held by Col. John McIntosh and a force of 200 men.

Not until after the fall of Savannah did Fort Morris capitulate, and only when assaulted by a vastly superior force of 200 British under Col. Augustin Prevost. As it was, Fort Morris was the last American post in Georgia to fall to the British. "Come and get it," the historically famous reply of Col. McIntosh to Fuser, has been immortalized in the American language.

The capture of Fort Morris and of Sunbury marked the end of the town's commercial position. Although it still numbered a few inhabitants until the War Between the States, it never regained its former prosperity.

It is still possible to trace the outlines of Fort Morris although it is almost completely overgrown by vegetation. Very little is left of Sunbury, however, and an expanse of wooded and cleared land gives only faint indications that a thriving town once occupied the site.

The members of the society and their guests will depart for the afternoon excursion to Midway from the Hotel De Soto at 2:30 o'clock. The public is cordially invited to this, as well as to all other open parts of the two-day program.

It will be the first archaeological meeting in Savannah, and the proposed activities and features. Among them a special display of Irene Mound finds, arranged for the occasion by Dr. V. J. Pauzis, are anticipated with keen interest.
MIDWAY CHURCH, LIBERTY COUNTY, GEORGIA

Field Report, October 19, 1936

James W. Holland
MIDWAY CHURCH, MIDWAY, GEORGIA

Name of site: Midway Church.

Location: In Liberty County, Georgia, on U.S. Highway 17, 65 miles from Savannah.

Accessibility: Is located on paved U.S. Highway, on the coastal route from the cities of the Northeast to Florida. U.S. Highway 17 is also known as the Atlantic Coastal Highway.

Description of setting: The approach to the Midway Meeting House is through a pine wood. The surrounding country is very sparsely populated, and many acres of high springs, rice, and indigo plantations have been abandoned to the rank weeds and other growth characteristic of the Georgia coast.

Description of site: The Midway Church, built in 1798, is a marvelously well-preserved frame structure, two stories in height, and painted white. The upper floor has twenty-four windows, the large number being due to the fact that a negro balcony takes up most of the room on that floor. The roof is steep, sloping at about a 45° angle. A steeple surmounts a square weather-boarded tower.

Historical Narrative: The Midway Region was settled in 1753 by about 320 Puritans who had previously taken up residence in South Carolina. Their ancestors had come to America in the great migration to Massachusetts in 1630. After a generation or two there they had become Anglicized and had moved on to South Carolina. In 1753, they left South Carolina and settled on a tract of 32,000 acres secured through agreement with the Georgians. This land was south of the Ogeechee midway between the Savannah and Altamaha rivers, and thus the settlement was called Midway.

The Puritan settlers of Midway had brought with them livestock and seed to clear out rice and tobacco plantations. They were a religious people and maintained a Congregational form of church government. The first church of logs was erected on the present site in 1756 and became the center of community life for the region known as Midway.

At first the Midway people traveled and shipped their goods overland to Savannah, by the old military road built by Hugh drained, but progress required a seaport, so they built Darien, which became an important port of entry and a rival of Savannah.
The Midway settlement, due probably to sympathy for the Puritan brethren of Massachusetts, was the first group of people in Georgia to take action siding with the other colonies in opposing England. Without waiting for the united action of Georgia, the St. John's Parish (Midway) people entered, on Dec. 1, 1774, the non-importation association which had recently been established by the Continental Congress. When the First Provincial Congress of Georgia met the following January, the St. John's delegation sought to force that body to accept the association and, failing, they determined to secede from Georgia and form an alliance with South Carolina, but this was not accomplished largely due to the indifference of Carolina. In March, the Midway settlement sent the only representatives from Georgia to the Second Continental Congress; their representative was Lyman Hall.

Throughout the Revolution, the Midway region held fast to its patriotic spirit, and earned for itself bitter retribution from the British when they invaded the area in 1778. At that time the old Midway Church was burned by the British. In recognition of services in the Revolution, St. John's Parish was afterward made Liberty County, and it bears that name today.

An astonishing number of prominent persons were connected with the Midway settlement in greater or less degree. Dr. Blyth Holmes, author of the Waste, and father of Oliver Wendell Holmes, was pastor of Midway for six years. Jedidiah Morse, "father of American geography" was pastor for a time. Of the three signers of the Declaration of Independence from Georgia, two (Lyman Hall and Button Gwinnett) were from this region. It was the home of the notable scientists and educators, John and Joseph LaCoste. Others, too, C. S. Jones, Jr., eminent Georgia historian, lived in boyhood years. This list is far from exhaustive; to it could be added an imposing array of statesmen, scientists, educators, and clergymen along with a host of others unknown to fame who contributed their modest lives to the good citizenship.

Historical Evaluation: For leadership in the American Revolution as well as in the arts of peace, this small community is outstanding; a the center of the Puritan settlement which has had a large part in the shaping of the destiny of the State, it is most interesting. One author (Gratelle A. Park, in Ga. Hist. Soc. Quarterly, XIII) is of the opinion that "a mere handful of settlers, the little Puritan colony, has wielded a greater influence in the State, and from its members have come a larger number of men of ability, character, and influence than any other group of our population."

From the records, it would appear that this seemingly antagonistic claim is substantially correct.

Present Ownership: Probably owned by congregation of the church.
Sponsorship: It is not known that it could definitely be termed a "sponsor," but the Midway Society, composed of descendants of the founders and early members of this church, is interested in anything pertaining to the Midway Church.

Restoration and repairs: None required; kept in good repair by congregation.

Previous treatment: The site has been kept in condition by succeeding generations of members of this church. Thus no treatment in the sense of restoration has been undertaken; nor is any necessary. A memorial marker has been placed there. Also in the cemetery in the Midway Church yard is a large monument, fifty feet high and thirty feet square at its base, erected by the United States Government in honor of two generals of the Revolutionary War who are buried there. The men honored are Brig.-Gen. James Screven and Brig.-Gen. Jonathan Moultrie. The monument was received in a skirmish with the British near Midway Church, November 22, 1778, and Brig.-Gen. Daniel Stewart, a great-grandfather of President Theodore Roosevelt.

Interested treatment: There is hardly a possibility that any congregation of the church would even consider surrendering title to the grounds. However, it is likely that they would approve recognition of the site as a historic area. It is suggested that the Midway group (Sunbury, Port Norris, and Midway Church and cemetery) be designated a Revolutionary memorial. The State of Georgia might accomplish this by improving the road to Sunbury and Port Norris, and placing at Midway Church (at the junction of the Sunbury road with U.S. highway 17) markers briefly telling the visitor the significance of the immediate region and directing him to Sunbury.

Museum: While a museum would not be indispensable, one would be desirable to interpret the Puritan influence in Georgia which centered at Midway, and to illustrate the part played by the area in the Revolution.

Research materials: The amount of necessary research depends on whether or not a museum is to be established. The Colonial Records of the State of Georgia and Revolutionary Records of the State of Georgia should prove helpful. Some secondary works to be consulted are:

4. Miller, J. B., Short Account of the Congregational Church at Midway, Georgia (Savannah, 1840).
5. Martin, J. E., Midway, Georgia, in History and Legend
   (Savannah, 1938).
6. Malirin, Mrs. Peter, ed., Some Early epitaphs in Georgia
   (Savannah, 1924).
7. Stacy, James, History of the Midway Congregational Church, Liberty County, Georgia (Macon, Ga., n.d.), Preface dated August 1, 1899, Second edition, 1905.
8. Stacy, James, ed., The Published Records of the Midway Church.
   In Library, Georgia Historical Society, Savannah, Ga.

Also biographies and biographical sketches of the outstanding men of this community should yield additional information.

Photographs: None available for this report. Published photographs of Midway Church appear in Stacy, Hist. of Midway Cong. Church ..., facing title page, and E. M. Coultier, A Short History of Georgia (Chapel Hill, N.C., 1933), 90.

Published Map: Location: Map of the parish of Georgia, including St. Johns (Midway), in Stacy, op. cit., facing p. 29. Midway is shown on all Georgia road maps.

Respectfully submitted:

James W. Holland
James W. Holland
Junior Clerk Historian.

Received:

Holsten B. Lettmore, Superintendent,
F.W. Lettmore National Monument.
ADDRESS BEFORE THE GEORGIA SOCIETY OF ARCHAEOLOGY

Meeting at Midway Church, May 7, 1938

James W. Holland
Address before the Georgia Society of Archaeology, meeting at Midway Church, May 7, 1858, by James W. Holland, Branch of Historic Sites and Buildings, National Park Service

Just before the dawn of the twentieth century, a visitor viewing the field that had been Sunbury, issued what now becomes a challenge to the archaeologists of Georgia. He wrote: "Like Pompeii of old, the whole now lies buried beneath the ashes of years, but unlike Pompeii, utterly beyond the hope of future exhumation." Could he have seen the unfolding of the interest of Georgians in their state's history, he would have been more circumspect than to assume that such a project never would be undertaken. Could he have known of the scientific magic of the archaeologist to be developed in the century than at hand, he would have been more cautious than to assert its impossibility.

Sunbury, of all Georgia's historic "lost" towns - Ebenezer, Joseph's Town, Frederica, Hardwick, Petersburg, Jacksonville, Francisville, Federal-Town, Harrisburgh, Hartford - Sunbury is perhaps the most interesting because its apparent chances for success were better than those of the others. Sunbury: in 1772 a respected rival of Savannah for commercial supremacy in Georgia; in 1792, an unmarked field to the south of the important and prosperous city of Savannah.

In the year that the Georgia Trustees surrendered their charter, some twenty years after the founding of Georgia by Oglethorpe, the Midway settlements were established. No immigrants from foreign shores were these, but a group of Puritans, descended from the settlers of Massachusetts' great migration of 1630, thus bringing with them an American background a century older than would be claimed by Georgia's first settlers. Their forebears had left the mother colony in 1696 and, turning their steps southward, had settled on the Ashley River in South Carolina, principally at Dorchester and Beech Hill. Desiring a compact settlement, their tracts of land were small and with the division and subdivision of these among successive generations, the farms became too small to support a growing population. By reason of economic necessity, then, many young persons were forced to leave the communities, which in their close-knit society was more than ordinarily distressing. Moreover, it was alleged by some that the region around Dorchester and Beech Hill was a "sickly part of the country."

Clearly, more land, more favorably situated, was needed if the community were to survive. Several attempts to discover a promised land in Carolina had failed, when, in 1752, after thorough inspection, a delegation from the congregation applied for the Midway lands in Georgia. A grant of some 20,000 acres of land - later increased to 32,000 - was reserved for the Carolina Puritans for a period of eighteen months pending actual settlement or a movement in that direction.

The first of August, 1752, found a small band of Georgia's pioneer Puritans making their way to Midway, but after a series of misfortunes, they returned to Carolina. The Church Records affirm: "These adverse Providences were very discouraging to most, and brought the affair of our removing to a considerable stand."

But steel-souled and stout-hearted Puritans were not long to be deterred by anything short of absolute catastrophe. In December, 1752, the van of the new colony arrived, when Benjamin Baker and Samuel Bacon, with their families, made a settlement. It seems that only Parmenas Way and his family arrived at Midway in 1753, but in the following year, seventeen families, including that of the pastor, and two single men, migrated to the Georgia land and thus the permanence of the settlement became more nearly assured. When it had been completely established, the settlement comprised three hundred and fifty whites and fifteen hundred Negroes.

There followed the typical pioneer labors of clearing land and building houses and outbuildings. The task was further complicated at Midway by the necessity of ditching and draining the swamps to prepare them for the cultivation of rice which was to be the staple crop of the region. It was, however, mitigated by the use of slave labor.

With the high regard for order characteristic of Puritans, the settlers framed in 1754, "Articles and Rules of Incorporation" for governing their society. The preamble constitutes a succinct expression of Puritan philosophy:

We, the subscribers ... being sensible of the advantages of good order and social agreement, among any people, both for their Civil and Religious Benefit; and especially its necessity among us as a Christian Society ... and being willing to lay a foundation by the Blessing of God of peace and harmony among ourselves, and inoffensiveness to all our neighbours ... in order to obtain these good ends proposed; do accordingly come under the following articles of agreement ...

On the first four Sundays after the arrival of the families in 1754, services had been held at private houses, the while a log house was being erected for temporary use as a church. Two years later, a new meeting house was built and on January 2, 1757, the dedicatory sermon was there delivered. This church, pride of a devout people who shunned pride in material things, was a creditable structure of hand-hewn cypress, 44 by 36 feet and 18 feet in height.

"Rich in wisdom and good citizenship," the Midway people early began to prosper. In the first years, their trade was conducted overland on the old military road built by Hugh Mackay some twenty years before to connect Savannah with the Highlander outpost at New Inverness (now Darien), and upon which the meeting house of Midway had been built. Feeling the need for a seaport, however, the Midway people began to work for its fulfillment. Sunbury was the result.

Early in 1757, the Midway planters had petitioned for twenty-two acres at the site of Sunbury to be used as a boat landing, but action on the petition had been postponed until it could be determined whether or not the land was legally vacant. On July 11, attention was dramatically directed to the fact that Sunbury constituted the natural point of entry by water to the settlement. On that day, having been warned of the activity of privateers, a party went to Sunbury where they "raised a couple of Batteries and made Carriages for eight Small Cannon which were at the place. As a further protection against depredations by the Indians or other enemies in the French and Indian War, the Midway people enclosed the meeting house within a "defence".

In June, 1758, Mark Carr conveyed in trust 300 acres on the Midway River to be laid out as a town by the name of Sunbury, one hundred acres being reserved as a common. The town was duly established and enjoyed a rapid rise to commercial prosperity. Only three years after its founding, Sunbury was declared a port of entry. From this port was shipped the rice from the swamp plantations of the backcountry, the principal trade being... with the West Indies and the northern colonies. Sunbury became, too, a favorite "retreat" for planters whose plantations lay in the unhealthful swamps. Soon it established itself as a commercial rival of older Savannah.

Lying between the mouths of the Midway and Sapelo rivers, within view of the town of Sunbury, and part of the same parish, was St. Catherine's Island. It was leased, in 1765, by Dutton Gwinnett, who sold his mercantile business in Savannah, to become a planter on this sea island. Gwinnett was a frequent visitor to Sunbury on business and socially. Especially significant was his strong personal friendship with Dr. Lyman Hall of that town, "one of the earliest and most influential of the 'Sons of Liberty'."

The rise in importance of the port of Sunbury made advisable the maintenance of adequate defenses. In the spring of 1760 the Legislature voted "for the use of the Fort erected at Sunbury and for the use of the Fort erected at Edway ... a Sum to each not exceeding twenty five pounds ..." Late in the following year, one hundred pounds were appropriated for the construction of a lookout and battery on Midway River.

Sunbury, with a view toward concentrating all the trade possible from the interior, was active in sponsoring that type of enterprise known in a later era as "internal improvements." In 1762, for example, a new public road was authorized from Sunbury to join the southwest road near the plantation of Samuel Hastings. At another time, it was proposed to connect Midway and North Newport rivers by a canal between Colonel's Island and the mainland, but the plan was not effected.

The heyday of the port of Sunbury came in the 1770's. In the year 1771, fifty-six vessels were cleared at the custom house there. William Bartram, botanist and traveler in the Southern colonies in that decade, visited Sunbury and the Midway Church in 1773. He observed that Sunbury was beautifully situated on the main between Edway and Newport rivers, about fifteen miles south of the great Ogeeche river. The town and harbour are defended from the fury of the seas by the north and south points of St. Helena and Saint Catherine's islands ... the harbour is capacious and safe, and has water enough for ships of great burthen. I arrived here in the evening ... one of the inhabitants ... politely introduced me to one of the principal families.

where I supped and spent the evening in a circle of genteel and polite ladies and gentlemen...

In regard to other parts of St. John's Parish, Bartram wrote:

On the morrow obedient to the admonitions of my attendant spirit, curiosity, I again set off on my southern excursion and left Sunbury in company with several of its polite inhabitants who were going to Midway meeting, a very large and well constructed place of worship...

After listening to a "very excellent sermon..." by their pious and truly venerable pastor," Bartram continued down the Savannah-Darien highway, "passing through a level country well watered by large streams...coursing from extensive swamps and marshes...; these swamps are daily clearing and improving into large fruitful rice plantations, aggrandizing the well inhabited and rich district of St. John's parish."

Then came the American Revolution to disturb the minds of the inhabitants of Midway and Sunbury, and to halt their steady rise to prosperity. Georgia, the youngest, most remote, most sparsely populated, poorest, and comparatively least important of the Original Thirteen was at first not much concerned with the discontent manifested by her sister colonies to the northward. Of the obnoxious legislation of which they complained, Georgia had experienced only the Stamp Act, and even that had not been enforced within her borders. The most recent historian of Georgia thus concisely states the case:

Georgia had been the pet of English philanthropy and of the English Parliament; a million dollars had been expended upon her in addition to all the charity that had gone along with the founding and early development of the colony. Gratitude might well have made Georgia the last stronghold of British loyalty in America.

In arousing Georgia to a spirit of resistance of Britain, the Puritans of St. John's parish took the lead, and among the most zealous was Dr. Lyman Hall, ably seconded by his friend, Button Gwinnett. Although Dr. Hall owned a rice plantation on the Savannah-Darien road a short distance north of Midway meeting house, his residence was at Sunbury. As a leading physician of the region, his influence was widespread and he early assumed, and never relinquished his stand for liberty.

The First Continental Congress, meeting in 1774, without delegates from Georgia, had adopted a non-importation agreement and had decided to convene another congress the following year. The St. John's planters watched with interest the proceedings in Savannah, hoping that Georgia's metropolis would follow the course indicated by the Continental Congress. For a variety of reasons, not the least of which was the personal popularity of the Royal Governor, Sir James Wright, many Georgians who later were to adopt the cause of liberty were hesitant. When it appeared that the remainder of Georgia would fail to ratify the non-importation agreement, a committee composed entirely of delegates from St. John's parish, with Lyman Hall presiding, ratified, independently of the rest of Georgia, the "general Association" recommended by the Continental Congress.

Equally, with South Carolina, incensed over Georgia's inactivity during the early months of 1775, St. John's parish sent emissaries to Charleston to advocate the alliance of their Georgia parish with the province of South Carolina. This proposition the South Carolina Committee rejected on the ground that it would violate an article of the General Association. It is perhaps interesting to note that here we find the doctrine of secession advanced by the New England-descended inhabitants of St. John's parish before the government of the United States had been established. We find South Carolina, too, at least by implication, rejecting the doctrine.

Then independently both of Georgia and of South Carolina, St. John's parish elected her own representative to the forthcoming Continental Congress. The choice fell to Lyman Hall who was unanimously admitted to membership by the Congress subject only to the condition that he should not vote on questions decided by a vote by colonies.

After news of the battle of Lexington reached Savannah (May 10), the dormant revolutionary spirit in Georgia stirred into action. In the following month a Council of Safety was set up to direct the "affairs of the friends of freedom," and within a month thereafter the government had been completely taken away from the Royal Governor. Five men were elected from Georgia at large for service in the Continental Congress and Georgia had followed Sunbury and Midway into the patriot cause.

In January, 1776, the next Provincial Congress of Georgia assembled at Savannah and during this session chose John Houstoun, Archibald Bulloch, Lyman Hall, Button
Gwinnett and George Walton delegates to the Continental Congress. Of these, Hall, Gwinnett, and Walton gained immortality by signing the revered "Declaration of Independence." The "Declaration was received with joy and celebration throughout Georgia "but nowhere with greater approval than in St. John's parish, the home of Hall and Gwinnett."

Gallant Midway and Sunbury were to suffer for their strong stand for liberty. In January, 1776, a British fleet lay at the entrance of the Savannah River and it was feared that the port of Sunbury might likewise be closed. Accordingly, the Council of Safety advised "the utmost vigilance in watching the motions of the pilots for the harbour of Sunbury..." The regular annual meeting of the Midway Society was held in March, but the minutes indicate "few met this Province being in a State of alarm, and the major Part of the men of this District being at Savannah."

In June, 1776, a number of Negroes were employed to "finish in a more proper manner the intrenchments about Sunbury." This work included the building of a fort just below the town at the point where the high ground ended and the broad impracticable marshes between the main and Colonel's Island began. In the same month, Colonel James Screven was ordered to bring cannon from Frederica, for mounting at the work at Sunbury, which was given the name Fort Morris. The fortification was an enclosed earthwork, so substantial that it stands today after having been subjected to bombardment and to the rains and winds of more than a century and a half.

For the first three years of the war for independence, the major campaigns were conducted far north of Georgia. That colony, however, suffered much from incursions of the Loyalists from their base at St. Augustine. In 1776, Sunbury was the rendezvous for the forces of General Charles Lee in his punitive expedition against East Florida. In the following year, Colonel Samuel Elbert embarked troops from Sunbury for St. Augustine.

The year 1778 brought disaster to the Midway people of old St. John's parish, which had the preceding year been given, for obvious reasons, the name Liberty County, a name she hears with justifiable pride today. Early in 1778, some alarm having been experienced for the safety of Sunbury, measures were taken to complete the earthwork and batteries, and other emergency action was taken looking toward the defense of the port.

The expected blow fell in November. The reduction of Savannah was a part of Lord George Germain's carefully planned Southern campaign of 1778. The American general, Robert Howe, was then holding Savannah, and in an attempt to divert his attention to the more southern part of the state, General Augustin Prevost was ordered to send out from St. Augustine, two expeditions. One of these, traveling by water, was to make a direct attack on Sunbury and its guardian Fort Morris; the other, by land, was to march through lower Georgia, laying waste the countryside, and to join the other force at Sunbury, whence both would proceed to Savannah to assist Colonel Archibald Campbell who was sailing from New York with 2,000 men.

Accordingly, General Prevost sent by water a detachment of infantry and light artillery under the command of Col. L. V. Fuser for the reduction of Fort Morris and Sunbury. Col. Mark Prevost was to lead the land force of 100 British regulars and 300 Indians and Tories.

On November 17, three deserters from the Florida forces brought to Midway the disquieting news that Col. Prevost's army was approaching. Two days later, as the British column entered Georgia and began its program of destruction, the Midway patriots marched down to contest the passage. On the Savannah-Darien road at Bulltown Swamp, Prevost's force was confronted by Col. John Taker leading a hastily assembled group of mounted militiamen. After a sharp skirmish in which Col. Taker, Capt. Cooper, and William Goulding were wounded, the patriots were forced back to the North Newport Bridge (later called Riceboro Bridge) where they made another brave, but vain, attempt to stem the British advance on Midway.

On the morning of November 20, Col. John White, in command of the Midway fortifications, was joined by Brig. Gen. James Screven and twenty militiamen. A defensive position was selected about a mile and a half south of the meeting house where the Darien road passed through a thick wood. Apparently Prevost had selected the same position, for the two forces reached the spot almost simultaneously, neither having time to take up a strong position. In the action that followed, General Screven was mortally wounded, and sleeps now in the Midway cemetery in the land he gave his life to defend.

Col. White fell back to Midway Church, destroying bridges as he retired over the causeway. Abandoning the meeting house, he then proceeded in the direction of Great Ogeechee Ferry where he added his troops to the American forces already there.
But the British colonel was not to be drawn into the trap. After pursuing only about six or seven miles, Prevost, upon discovering that Fuser had not arrived at Sunbury as scheduled, decided to return to St. Augustine.

Upon the approach of the British force, the "Neighbourhood of Midway fled from their habitations," most of them going to the American encampment on the Ogeechee.
Now, as Prevost retraced his steps to Florida, he burned almost all the deserted houses in the community and the crops as well. The Midway Meeting House, too, pride of the inhabitants of the region and the center of their religious and community life, was burned to the ground. Thus did Midway pay a price for her adherence to the principle of freedom.

Sunbury, however, had not fallen. Fuser, delayed by head winds, failed to arrive before Sunbury until Prevost had begun his retreat and had passed beyond reach of communications. Late in November, Fuser's vessels anchored off Colonel's Island, and there he landed his infantry and artillery. The field pieces were trained on Fort Morris and up the Midway River moved the armed vessels to a position in front of the fort.

Fort Morris was held at this time by Col. John McIntosh with 127 Continental troops together with some militia and citizens of Sunbury, numbering fewer than 200 in all. Fuser served McIntosh the ultimatum which follows:

SIR,

You cannot be ignorant that four armies are in motion to reduce this Province. One is already under the guns of your fort, and may be joined, when I think proper, by Colonel Prevost who is now at the Midway meeting-house. The resistance you can, or intend to make, will bring destruction upon this country.
On the contrary, if you will deliver me the fort which you command, lay down your arms and remain neuter until the fate of America is determined, you shall, as well as all of the inhabitants of this parish, remain in peaceable possession of your property. Your answer, which I expect in an hour's time, will determine the fate of this country, whether it is to be laid in ashes, or remain as above proposed.

I am Sir,
Your most obedient Svt.,
L. V. FUSER,
Colonel 60th Regiment and Commander of his Majesty's Troops in Georgia, on his Majesty's Service.

The American defender of the fort promptly sent his answer:

SIR,
We acknowledge we are not ignorant that your army is in motion to endeavour to reduce this State. We believe it is entirely chimerical that Colonel Prevost is at the Meeting-House; but should it be so, we are in no degree apprehensive of danger from a junction of his army with yours. We have no property compared with the object we contend for that we value a rush: - and would rather perish in a vigorous defence than accept of your proposals. We Sir, are fighting the battles of America, and therefore disdain to remain neutral till its fate is determined. As to surrendering the fort --- COME AND TAKE IT ---

I have the honor to be Sir,
Your most obedient Servant,
JOHN McINTOSH,
Colonel of Continental Troops

Instead of attacking immediately, Fuser waited for word from scouts sent out to determine Prevost's position. Finding that the latter, after his Midway raid had retired to Florida, Fuser raised the siege of Fort Morris and Sunbury, re-embarked his troops and joined Prevost at the St. John's River.

Although the Midway region was free of enemy troops in December, 1778, it had been left in deplorable condition. Ethetically the refugees returned to view the wreckage that had been homes and fruitful fields. Some returned to the ashes to build anew; others, discouraged, wearily turned to South Carolina.

Despite the failure of the two Florida forces to reach Savannah, that town, in December, 1778, fell before an attack by Col. Campbell's army operating alone. Howe's army retreated in great confusion and with considerable loss, crossing the Savannah River at Stater's and Zubly's ferries, and reassembled in South Carolina, leaving the State of Georgia open to the British forces. On the retreat Howe had paused long enough to order Major Joseph Lane, then commanding Fort Morris, to evacuate, retire up the south side of the Ogeechee, and join the main force at Zubly's Ferry. Major Lane, determined to defend Sunbury at any cost, flatly disregarded these orders of his superior officer, and remained at his post. Thus as the year 1778 faded into history and the next began, little Fort Morris stood with a comparatively great British army to the north at Savannah and another to the south at St. Augustine, alone in all the state proudly flying the flag of liberty from her ramparts.

Down in Florida, General Prevost, having heard of the fall of Savannah, left St. Augustine with an army of about 2,000 men to join Campbell. On the way, he stopped at Sunbury, and after three days of maneuvering into position for the investment of Fort Morris, on January 9, demanded its surrender. Major Lane refused and attempted a gallant defense but, after spirited fighting, was compelled by superior force of arms to surrender.

The Midway region of Liberty county, including Sunbury and Fort Morris, last of all Georgia to be surrendered to the British, was thereupon subjected to a strict military regime. The fort was renamed, by its conquerors, Fort George, in honor of the sovereign who was no sovereign over the free spirits of the Liberty county people.

On July 11, 1783, with the columns of "Mad Anthony" Wayne steadily advancing, the British evacuated Savannah, after having held possession for more than four and one-half years, and Georgia was freed of British rule. The effects of the war had been disastrous. The Negro population, never very stable, was demoralized, "plantations burned and converted into waste places, and the seeds of poverty and discontent sown broadcast."

With commendable and characteristic energy, the people of Liberty county worked to remedy their shattered fortunes. There was at this time a decided effort to re-establish war-torn Sunbury as a place of importance. In 1784 an act established the town as the county seat of Liberty county and provided for the erection there of a court house and jail. Sunbury, however, was destined never to regain its ante-bellum prosperity. True, in 1788, Sunbury Academy was incorporated and became the most famous institution of learning in southern Georgia, and as late as 1801 one misguided observed declared that Sunbury promised without doubt to become a "port of commercial consequence."

As early as 1797, however, it had become apparent to more discerning persons that the town was in the grip of an irremedial decline; accordingly in that year the county seat was moved to Riceboro. The last noteworthy vessel to put in at the port of Sunbury was a Swedish brig which, in 1814, carried a cargo of cotton from that port. The decline of Sunbury became absolute. All obvious traces of the town passing away, it joined the company of those which an eminent Georgia historian has called "the dead towns of Georgia."

Soon after the return of the Midway people to their homes, in 1784, arose the question of the erection of a new meeting house to replace the beloved one consumed by the flames of war. The first problem was one of location: whether to build the new church on the site of the older one "or on some Place more central." The question would seem to involve a contest between practicality and sentiment; if so, the sentimentalists were victorious for it was decided by the narrowest of margins - a vote of 15 to 14 - that the meeting house should occupy the spot hallowed by the old.

The matter of location decided, there remained what to these war-impoverished churchmen was a more vexing problem, that of financing the construction of the new edifice. As an expedient it was decided that a temporary or "coarse" church be built forthwith to serve until a more permanent one could be erected.

Under the guidance of young Reverend Abiel Holmes, the spiritual life and community activities of the Midway society had a new awakening. Among other things, the Library Society, an institution of happier days, was revived.

In 1790, six years after the building of the temporary meeting house, the construction of a large and more suitable church again was seriously considered. Two years later, when the cruel war lay nine years in the past and when, with the great George Washington as president, the government of the United States under the Constitution was in its third experimental year, the new church was built. It is the building in which we are now assembled.

Notable indeed this community has been in the production of outstanding leaders in many fields and of sound citizenship among her sons and daughters in general. The lasting fame of the people of this region rests on their contribution to American liberty -- a spirit epitomized by Colonel McIntosh, when, into the very mouths of hostile cannon, he hurled the words: "We, Sir, are fighting the battles of America ... As to surrendering the fort ... COME AND TAKE IT."
HISTORIC SITES SURVEYS AND HISTORIC DATA

SOUTHEAST GEORGIA 1936-1938
Union Bag Nursery Near Midway

Union Bag Corporation to Produce Million Nursery Grown Pine Trees

BY M. H. KAHNER

Approximately one million pine seedlings are now growing in Union Bag and Paper Corporation's nursery, located on their Lyman Hall Plantation about thirty miles south of Savannah on the Ogeechee road.

The old, historic tract of land, by an approximately one-half mile north of Midway, was acquired by the Union Bag and Paper Corporation about two and one-half years ago. The plantation derives its name from its ownership for a time by Dr. Lyman Hall, a native of Wallingford, Conn., who was graduated from Yale College in 1771.

When a young man he came to Dorchester, S. C., and later came to Georgia with a band of English settlers at Midway in the Parish of St. John, north of the Ogeechee River. He was an active oyster dealer, and the American Colonists were much at this young man's North Sea influence. And the people of his vicinity, were early and vigorous advocates of the Cause of Liberty.

In response to this, the first Continental Congress met at Lyman Hall was also a descendant of the Parish of St. John, which embraced the area in which this plantation is located. Additional delegates came from other parishes, but at the time the Declaration of Independence was signed there were only three delegates present on behalf of Georgia; one being Button Gwinnett, the second, George Walton, and the third, Lyman Hall, whose three signatures appear on this famous instrument, representing the sovereign people of Georgia.

When the British overran Savannah and took possession of this area, he removed to the North with his family. During his absence his property was confiscated by the Royal government.

Union Bag and Paper Corporation has established its nursery on an old field long ago abandoned, and the plant. The nursery is under the immediate supervision of Charles H. Zavodny, a graduate forestry from the University of Georgia, and it is a year-round program. Pine cones and nursery are gathered in September and October before they have had an opportunity to germinate and scatter their seed naturally.

The cones or buds, mostly from slash pine trees, come from long leaf pine trees gathered by forest rangers in the company's employ. These rangers use ladders, or tree climbers to reach the peaks of well-formed, healthy and vigorous trees, from which they knock the cones. It is believed that cones can be gathered from the tops or trees immediately following logging operations.

Approximately 200 bushels of cones are required for the present nursery. They are placed in long shallow trays in a tobacco curing barn. Flies are started in the furnaces underneath the tobacco barn and the cones, exposed to the heated air, open. The cones are then placed in a large shaker, which is rotated, causing the seed to drop onto a canvas placed beneath the shaker. Wings attached to each seed, by which means nature, with the aid of the wind, disperses the seed over wide areas, are removed by beating and fanning. The clean seed are stored in a cool dry place until the following March.

They are then sown in beds 100 feet long and four feet wide, made in cleared and cultivated ground. Each bed has a two-foot path along sides to allow for easy access. The seeds are dressed into the ground with a roller and are covered with a layer of fine soil. A sprinkler system, filled with water from a flowing artesian well, furnishes the necessary amount of water needed during the long months while the young trees are growing. By December they are from six to ten inches tall, and like most all plants, they become dormant for the winter period. They are now removed (the trees are counted in bountiful numbers), of 1,000 and carefully packed in wet moss in pick-up trucks for delivery to the different planting sites.

Planting sites of pines are usually on old abandoned fields cultivated years ago and which have not yet seeded into pine from the surrounding woods. These are several thousand acres of such fields on Union Bag's vast timberland holdings. After these fields have been planted in the forest land will be planted and it is possible that the company may later furnish seedlings to farmers and other small land owners in the Savannah area anxious to grow pulpwod.

The small trees or seedlings are set out in shallow furrows made by a middle buster or other type plow. These furrows are eight feet apart and the seedlings are spaced every eight feet, making a total of 600 trees per acre. Planting is usually done by purpentine hands who are mostly idle during the winter months. The method is done in pairs or one and half acres, or 1,000 seedlings per day.

No cultivation or fertilization is necessary. It often occurs, especially in dry seasons, that 20 or 30 percent of these seedlings will die. Grazing is often a cause of death. Goats and sheep will at times eat the small seedlings. The vacant spaces caused by this mortality are refilled with other seedlings that may be left over. Fires are especially damaging and all plantations must be surrounded by fire breaks maintained by heavy plows and harrows developed especially for this purpose.

After the first year these planted seedling will gain at the rate of from two to four inches in height per year and as much as six inches in diameter. After eight or ten years these plantations can be thinned for pulpwod, but at about fifteen years of age the trees will be large enough for turpentine operations. After being worked for naval stores the first or ten years they will be harvested for pulpwod.

The public is invited to the Union Bag and Paper Corporation at Lyman Hall Plantation, located thirty miles south of Savannah. Church on the Ogeechee River. The plantation and nursery are about one-half mile north of the old Midway Church.
PLANTATION HOMES OF GEORGIA

(A Listing)
A. Well preserved plantation houses c. 1830
(in order of priority)

I. Casaden Plantation

Location: High Shoals, near Athens, Clarke Co., Ga.
Extent: 6,000 acres — much of it is wooded out enough and cultivated to produce 1400 bales of cotton annually before the advent of the Bell weevil. Now farming has been considerably curtailed and abandoned fields are overrun with quail and other game. Some cotton is still raised.

When built: Oldest part of house built in 1825 of timber cut on the estate. Porch and wings are of slightly later date and in the classic style in favor at the time.

Grounds: Slave quarters have disappeared, but some of the original slaves and many of their descendants are tenants on the place. The old detached kitchen has been replaced by a modern "cook-room" but the old smoke house with its meat cutting bench still stands. A lovely garden of ante-bellum origin features...

Significance:

Present owner: Miss Sally Maud Jones

Significance: One of the few cotton planter's establishments to survive, virtually unchanged. "Its claim to distinction is not for grandeur or glory in the days that were, but more for carrying into these less glamorous times a picture of a peculiarly American civilization which can never come again."

II. Greenwood Plantation

Location: near Thomasville, Thomas County, Ga.
Extent: Present acreage 20,000. Probably not over 1500 in ante-bellum times.

When built: Built by Thomas Jones during the seven years 1830-1844.

Structure

House and grounds— Cotton plantation. Greek revival type designed by John Ward, prominent English architect. Family burying ground entered through a graceful Gettac arch gate.

Present owner: Mrs. and Mrs. Payne Whitney, of N. Y. Mr. Stanford White was retained to make improvements by the present owner.
he effected many improvements in the landscaping but advised that no alteration be made on the house.
III. Isaac P. Henderson Harris Plantation
Location: Covington, Newton Co., Ga.
Extent: Originally a cotton plantation, but now the town of Covington (5,000 pop.) has grown up around it.
When built: Built in 1830 by the Harris family pioneers in Covington.
House: Neo-classical type. Still in good condition.

IV. Rose Hill Plantation
Location: Elbert Co., Ga. Near Elberton Extent: 1,000 acres.
When built: Built in 1810, a former cottage being transformed into a large dwelling with the two-storied porches popular with many planters of the day. Two large wings have been added in the post-war period.
Grounds: Characterized by an avenue of elms. A twelve-foot cedar hedge divides the garden from the road. An attractive garden is maintained, comprising in all some 20 acres.
Present owner: Eugene Bernard Heard.

V. Pebble Hill Plantation
Location: About 6 miles south of Thomasville, Thomas County, on Dixie Highway.
When built: Date unknown. The estate was an original grant from the State of Georgia to James Johnson, and house was built in ante-bellum period.
House and grounds: House is a large, low and rambling, of the Southern colonial type. The central portion is old construction but wings have been added. Negro quarters are maintained for the colored servants. The plantation terrain and vegetation varies from hammeras of hard wood, cypress swamps, pine woods on high ground, to tenant fields.
Present owner: Mrs. Perry W. Harvey
VI. "Attama"

Location: on the Altamaha River, Glynn County, Ga., about 5 miles above Darien.

Extent: A considerable acreage, but exact extent unknown.

When built: In 1800 by James Hamilton Cooper on land bought from the earlier and larger Hopetown plantation.

House and grounds: A commodious tabby house on top of a knoll on the former site of an Indian village. On all sides but one were rice fields; on that one side was a stretch of pine barren and thicket of live oaks, magnolias and palmettos. The house still stands in the original grove but the old garden is gone and the house has been modernized and is now used as a hunting lodge.

Present owner: Gater Woolford.

VII. Malese Plantation

Location: 5 miles from Thomasville, Thomas County, Ga., on Dixie highway.

When built: Original house built c. 1850 by Dr. Samuel J. Jones.

House and grounds: Original house forms central unit but broad wings have been added. The old portion of the house is built of pine logs cut on the place covered with broad clapboards. The old slave quarters have been replaced with neat white cottages, and modern barns, garages, etc., but are grouped as were the ante-bellum plantation settlements. The approach from the highway is a broad grass walk bordered with tea hedges.

Present owner: Howard M. Mann.

VIII. "Oak Hill"

Location: About 5 miles from Greensboro, Greene Co., Ga.

When built: Built about 1820 by Judge Thomas Stock.

House and grounds: Cotton plantation, house two-story frame structure with colonnaded facade.
B. Ruined, Removed, or Radically Remodeled Plantation Houses.

I. The Hermitage

Location: A few miles above Savannah on the Savannah River.

When Built: 1794/1795. The estate was assembled through a series of purchases begun in 1814. A house was built in 1820.

House: Brick construction. Neo-classical, designed by Henry McAlpin, owner. Not occupied as residence after being sacked by Sherman's soldiers.

Present Owner: Henry Ford, of Detroit, who bought the Hermitage and removed it to his Bryan County estate and there restored it, brick by brick.

II. Mulberry Grove

III. Whitenall Plantation

Location: 6 miles above Savannah on Savannah River.

When Built: By Joseph Gibbons c. 1760. Grant from George III.

Grounds: Rice plantation property for 100 years. Lands confiscated after Revolution but Gibbons' heirs retained them until they were destroyed during the occupation of Savannah by Sherman. After the war a frame dwelling was built in which Joseph Gibbons' descendants, Joseph Gibbons still reside. It is built on a bluff overlooking the river and in a pristinely grove of giant live oaks under the shade of which bloom camellias and azaleas.
IV. Nepeton

Location: On the Altamaha River about 5 miles above Darien, Glynn Co., Ga.

When built: Jenn Cooper and James Hamilton, beta planters on St. Simons Island, in 1800 bought Wright's Island and Carr's Island five miles above Darien on the Altamaha. By 1816 a tabby mansion had been built at Nepeton.

House and Grounds: First cotton, then sugar, then rice was the principal crop of this plantation. In 1816 there were one thousand acres in rice fields, banked, drained and under cultivation. The height of cultivation was reached 1850-60.

Present owner: Unknown. "For fifty years Nepeton has been a jungle-surrounded ruin."

V. Bellevue and Fairfield Twin Plantations

Location: On the Satilla River, Camden Co., Ga.

When built: Built by Colonel Charles Floyd and son John in 1800.

Nature: Avenue of live oaks and cedars, typical of coastal plantations. First inage then cotton principal crop. Both houses were burned during the "war" between the States and were not rebuilt.

VI. Lebanon Plantation

Location: On the Little Ogeechee River, Camden Co., Georgia.

History: A 500 acre Crown grant in 1756 by George II to James Deveaux. In 1804 it became the property of James Nabersman and in 1806 it was bought by George Anderson who developed it into a successful cotton plantation.

Present condition: The house occupied by James Nabersman in 1804 still stands. It has, however, been remodeled and enlarged. In its original condition it was a large two-story frame house on a high brick basement and surrounded by a double tiered verandas. The land around was the typical avenue of live oaks, sections of which remain. It is now the country home of Mr. and Mrs. Mills B. Lane, the former a prominent Savannah banker.
I. Valley View

When built: In late 1840's by Col. James Caldwell Spreuil, who had moved to Cass County (now Bartow), Georgia and developed an extensive cotton plantation.

Nature: Large brick house built and a formal garden laid out. Both house and garden remain essentially unchanged, although the occupation of the house by Sherman's men has left its mark.

Grounds: Passing through the entrance gate, one passes travels through a quarter mile of woods before reaching the house which overlooks a wide valley. The garden is bordered on one side by Carolina cherry and on the other by wisteria and includes dwarf box, tree box, English laurel, euonymus, Norway spruce and fir, Persian lilacs, orange, flowering holly, jasmine, Pyrus japonica and forsythia. Next to the smoke house is an unusual feature, a brick water tower. The narrow stone brick walk from the gate to the area is typical.

Estimate: One of Georgia's best preserved mid-century cotton plantations.

Present owner: Spreuil Feuene.

II. The group at Roswell

Location: Roswell, Cobb County, Ga., near Atlanta.

Nature: A group of plantation houses arranged in a community. Founded by James Roswell King in the 1830's. This Community includes Barrington Hall, Bulloch Hall, and Mimsa. Bulloch Hall was the girlhood home of the mother of Theodore Roosevelt, who was also the grandmother of Mrs. Franklin Delano Roosevelt.

III. The "Homestead"

Location: Ashby Street in West End, Atlanta, Ga.

When built: Built in 1858 by John Tarasner, when Atlanta was only a village in a tract of 300 acres.

Nature: Brick, with two tiered porches in front and eight columns. Fine marble mantles in the original structure were carried off by Sherman's men and the equally fine ornamental iron work of the exterior was melted down by them.
I. Kelb-Peu-Newton Place

Location: Madison, Morgan County, Ga.

Nature: Town house but exemplifying characteristic of the typical plantation house.

When built: In 1861, at the height of Georgia's ante-bellum prosperity, Wilkes Kelb bought a block of property in the heart of Madison. On one-half of this block he built a house for himself and on the other half a house for his daughter, Mrs. Spears.

Description: Although a town house, the service yard, which in this case is at the side, contains not only a carriage house and stables but a cow barn as well and is flanked on one side by a vegetable garden and orchard and on the other by a pasture. Balancing these is a strip of ground running from street to street which is still spoken of as "the cotton path.

Ownership: Was bought in 1861 by Louis Peu and occupied by his family until 1905 when it passed into the hands of John Thomas Newton whose wife and daughter today make it their home.

II. Cowles-Benji-Coleman-Cabaniss-O'Neal Place

Location: Macon, Bibb County, Ga.

Nature: A town house built about 1838, "an outstanding example of what Georgia gentlemen of that period considered a proper setting for their home life."

Additions: In the 1850's eighteen Doric columns and flanking wings were added.

Condition: Excellent.

Present owner: B. T. O'Neal
SPANISH SITES IN GEORGIA

(A Listing)
Ouala (Santa Catalina) (St. Catherine's)

In April, 1585, Pedro de Lanas de Aviles, founder of St. Augustine in the preceding year, visited the island now known as St. Catherine's. He left that time the name of Ouala which came to be applied to entire Georgia coast and proceeded on to Santa Elena but on his way back in August again stopped at Ouala (Santa Catalina) and left there a garrison of 50 men. This was the first of the Spanish settlements on the Georgia coast. In 1585 the first two Jesuit missionaries, Brothers Domingo Agustín and Pedro Ruíz, went to Ouala with three others soon following. In 1570 however the Ouala mission was deserted as a result of an Indian uprising, and the missionaries went to Virginia. First of the Franciscans missionaries to Santa Elena in 1578, after Drake's attack on Santa Elena, Santa Catalina becomes northern outpost of Spanish. New epoch in 1585 when five additional missionaries (Franciscans) established in Ouala, Aman and 2dejas on Santa Catalina. The Ouala missions flourished for two years, then in an Indian revolt in 1587, in which the missionaries of Santa Catalina, as well as those of the other islands, were killed, there being but one exception - Father Navila at Opo who was seized and taken to Indian village in interior. At the beginning of the seventeenth century the missions were again established.

Santa Elena = Presidio San Felipe

Northern outpost of Spanish influence until 1587 when abandoned as a result of a raid by Sir Francis Drake, after which 6anta Catalina (above) enjoyed that distinction. Jesuit mission established at Cristóbal near Santa Elena in 1598, abandoned in 1570. In 1570 Franciscans came to Santa Elena. In 1587 the Spanish garrison removed to St. Augustine as a result of Drake's raid on Santa Elena. Location: Port Royal (Farris Island?)

Cofitochequi 1. (Casinta)

Indian village ruled over by a princess and visited by De Soto on his exploration. Location: "Georgians have delighted to locate it near Augusta, but others have placed it as far eastward as Columbia, in South Carolina" = Coluber. Location on Bulletin 75, plate 2, American Ethnology, Smithsonian Institution (Santon) shown as immediately above Apalachicola (2) on the Carolina side of the Savannah River.

San Pedro (Cumberland Island)

Garrison and Jesuit mission established here. Deserted in 1570. Garrison at San Pedro reduced to 50 men in same year. In revival of missionary work by Franciscans in 1575, Father Chouas and Pareja located mission on San Pedro. In Indian uprising (Yamassee) of 1597, the Indians of San Pedro remained faithful to the missionaries.

Location: "...probably in the vicinity of Baldhead Creek or of Hanford's Creek, both of these being tributaries of Ochiltree River. However, the site might have been about two miles south of these places." = Floyd.

(ed.), Ayredondo's Historical Proof of Spain's Title to Georgia, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1925.

and Mary Ross, The Uncertain Land, Berkeley: Univ. of Cal. Press, 1925. This also appears as an introduction to the work cited immediately above.

PRINTED MAPS EXAMINED

1. Entire series of maps in Stanton, op. cit. Plate 2 shows location of Cofitachequi.

2. Inside covers of Coulter, Georgia's Disputed Ruins.

March 24, 1926

Dr. John H. Swanton,
Bureau of American Ethnology,
Smithsonian Institution,
Washington, D. C.

Dear Sir:

We have been requested to furnish information regarding "all of the known historic sites in Georgia illustrative of 16th Century Spanish exploration and colonization," for presentation to the National Advisory Board on Historic Sites, Buildings and Monuments.

As a recognized authority in the field, your opinion would be highly appreciated, and it is hereby solicited. Can you suggest any sites that should be included in the above classification? If so, will you please furnish us with their exact location and a brief statement evaluating them?

It is thought that one or more sites along De Soto's route should be included, among them, perhaps, Cofitachequi although apparently located on the South Carolina bank of the Savannah River. Also it is thought proper to include the site of one or more of the Jesuit missions of Guale if their locations may be established beyond reasonable doubt.

Any assistance you may give us in this regard will be most sincerely appreciated.

Yours very truly,

James R. Holland,
Jr. 'ark Historian.
Smithsonian Institution
BUREAU OF AMERICAN ETHNOLOGY

Mr. James W. Holland, Jr., Park Historian,
Fort Pulaski National Monument,
Cockspur Island,
Savannah, Ga.,

Dear Mr. Holland:

The most important site on the Georgia coast connected with the Spanish period is St. Catherine's Island where there was a presidio at one time besides an important mission. If the old mission site of San Pedro Secane near the southern end of Cumberland Island could be located, it might be worth a tablet as it was of great importance in the mission history of Georgia and Florida.

The principal points along De Soto's route would be Bainbridge where he probably crossed the Flint, Abbeville, near the place where he came upon the Ocmulgee, the old site of Hartford across the Ocmulgee from Hawkinsville through which he undoubtedly passed. I also feel quite certain that his army crossed the Oconee River at Cary Shoals above Dublin, Silver Bluff just across the Savannah in South Carolina is generally regarded as the location of the town of Cofitachequi where De Soto met the famous "Lady of Cofitachequi." The identification is founded on an Indian tradition traceable as far back as the early 18th century. We can at least say this much that the town was certainly in that neighborhood.

Sincerely yours,

/she/ John R. Swanton
SUNBURY, LIBERTY COUNTY, GEORGIA

Field Report, October 14, 1936

James W. Holland
Name of Site: Sunbury.

Location: In Liberty County, Georgia, on a bend of the Midway River and near its mouth.

Accessibility: The site is fairly accessible. The village of Midway, Georgia is on U.S. Highway 17 (Atlantic Coastal Highway). To reach Sunbury, one turns east at Midway, leaving the highway for an old sand road, which is then followed for ten miles. The road is, in general, in poor condition and tends to become worse as it approaches Sunbury. It is, however, passable.

Description of Setting: All traces of a town have disappeared and in its stead are woodland and a cleared area, overlooking the inlet into which once sailed ships bearing wealth to Sunbury. One writer has said: "Like Pompeii of old, the whole now lies buried beneath the ashes of years, but unlike Pompeii, utterly beyond the hope of future exhumation." (Steeve, Hist. of Midway Cong. Church ... (1899), 240)

Historical Narrative: The land on which the town of Sunbury was later located was contained in a 500 acre grant to Mark Carr by the English Crown, October 4, 1767. In the following June, Carr conveyed 500 acres of this land in trust for the location of a town on Midway River, the project being instituted by the Puritan colony of Midway, which desired a seaport. The town was divided into 496 lots, most of which were soon sold, and the career of Sunbury which was soon to rival Savannah as a commercial center, was begun.

As early as 1765, Sunbury was made a port of entry by Governor Wright. Seven square-rigged ships have entered her harbor in one day; fifteen vessels were in port at one time. At the height of the town's prosperity came the Revolution, and Sunbury joined the rest of St. John's Parish in patriotic support of American Rights. Dr. Lyman Hall, one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence, lived at Sunbury. Button Gwinnett, another signer, though living on nearby St. Catherine's Island, spent much of his time at Sunbury, officially being "Justice of St. John's Parish" and socially, being frequently a visitor at the home of Dr. Hall. At Sunbury, Col. George Walton, the only other signer of the Declaration of Independence from Georgia, was sent as prisoner of war, after the fall of Savannah in 1778.

Sunbury was the rendezvous for the forces of Gen. Charles Lee in his expedition against Charleston in 1776. In the following year, Gen. Ely, with the troops from Sunbury against
It was at Sunbury that, in 1778, after Gen. Howe’s unsuccessful expedition to Florida, Col. C. C. Pinckney returned with his troops to rest. Sunbury’s fort (Fort Morris) was the last spot in Georgia to surrender when the state was overrun by the British in 1776. Not until Savannah had fallen and the forces withdrawn from Augusta, that Sunbury surrendered to British supremacy and then not until overwhelmed by superior numbers.

The war marked the doom of Sunbury; it never fully recovered and although the town remained in existence until the Civil War, it never regained its former condition of prosperity. Since the Civil War, it has been numbered among the “dead towns”.

One of the most interesting of Sunbury’s institutions is the Sunbury Academy, a co-educational school and the first of its kind to receive state aid in Georgia. It was authorized by the Legislature under an act approved February 1726. The curriculum of the academy included Greek and Latin, art, and other advanced subjects. Graduates entered the junior colleges of Yale, Harvard, and Princeton. Dr. William Meriwether was for thirty years master of the academy.

Historical evaluation: Sunbury, Fort Morris, and Midway were places that were scenes of the development and spread of the Revolutionary spirit in Georgia. As a group they formed what might perhaps be regarded as the nucleus of the Revolutionary story in Georgia -- the first to advocate a break with England and the last to surrender. Sunbury is interesting, too, as the site of a once flourishing town, which has entirely disappeared due to the working of a complex set of socio-economic laws. It is further noteworthy for its association with all three of the signers of the Declaration of Independence, from Georgia: George Walton, Button Gwinnett, and Lyman Hall.

Present ownership: The major part of the site is now owned by Joseph H. Jones, Orlando, Florida.

Ownership: A committee has been appointed to place a memorial tablet at Sunbury. The chief member of this committee seems to be Miss Laura Freeman of Plains, Georgia (Savannah Morning News, June 22, 1935). Also interested in the preservation of suitable deposition of the area is Mr. F. J. Owen, president of Liberty County Chamber of Commerce, whose address is Allentown, Georgia.

Restoration and repairs: The road leading to Sunbury, especially that part of it near the site, should be repaired. As to the site itself, no restoration would be recommended.
Previous treatment: None.

Suggested treatment: Improvement of road placements; enriching the site of the town. This can be done and it seems, is being planned, by a patriotic organization.

Research required: Enough research should be undertaken to make possible the writing of an accurate popular history of Sunbury, its fort (Morris) and its back country (Midway). Some works which should prove helpful in this regard are:
General works such as histories of Georgia by McColl, Stevens, and Coulter, and, in addition, the following:

Bartram, William, Travels Through North and South Carolina, Georgia... (London, 1792).
Cannan of the State of Georgia (Philadelphia, 1869).
Jenny, C. C., Jr., The Dead Towns of Georgia, Collections of the Georgia Historical Society, IV, 141-165 (Savannah, 1878).
Kirby, J. Edward, Puritanism in the South (Boston, 1908).
Stevens, James, History of the Midway Congregational Church, Liberty County, Georgia (Newnan, Ga., n.d.)

Photographs: See field report on Fort Morris. The scene there showed the only a few hundred yards from the site of Sunbury and the typical of the view at Sunbury.

Plan of site: A detailed plan of the town of Sunbury is to be found in C. C. Jenny, Jr., Dead Towns of Georgia, Collections of the Georgia Historical Society, IV, 141. The plan shows the dimensions of the town as 3430 feet in length from north to south, 2230 feet in breadth on south side and 1880 in breadth on north.

Respectfully submitted:

[Signature]

James S. Holland,
Junior Park Historian.

Approved:

[Signature]

Malcolm R. Lattimore,
Acting Superintendent,
Fort Pulaski National Monument.
83. Salt Water Property

100 Acres, Part of Historic old town of Sunbury on Medway River; high, level and heavily wooded; the outlook is over St. Catherine's Sound, one of the finest on the coast; about 1,000 acres of marsh goe with it. R. L. Cooper, 3-1271.