

the metallic shell that had contained the powder. This gun could be loaded and fired 16 times in a minute; but easily got out of repair, and was, from its shape, entirely unfit for the "manual of arms." Aside from "scouts" and "sharpshooters" it was never used by the army.

Next came the Spencer rifle. This, to our mind, was so nearly perfect, that after using it for two years, our brigade had not a single change to suggest; and after a lapse of 20 years we have seen nothing equal to it. The barrel of the Spencer rifle was two feet eight inches long; cased on the under side with a light strip of walnut, held in place by three rings or thimbles. This barrel screwed into a heavy piece of iron, which had a slot or mortice in it from top to bottom. In this mortice was the breech-pin, worked up and down by a lever much the same as the Henry rifle. The stock was of walnut, much the size and shape of the Springfield or Enfield rifles in common use in the army. In the centre of this stock was a cylinder, or barrel, which also screwed into the heavy piece of iron at the other end. This barrel would hold seven metallic cartridges; these cartridges were pushed up and held in place by a spiral spring. The hammer and trigger worked just like any other gun. To load, after the chambers were filled up, all you had to do was to throw the lever or trigger guard forward, which would throw out, on top, the empty cartridge shell from which the ball had been fired, and as you drew the lever back to its place another cartridge slipped into the barrel, ready to fire. This gun could be loaded and fired seven times in a minute. It never got out of repair. It was put together entirely with screws, and any body that had sense enough to be a soldier could take one all to pieces and put it all together, just as well as the man that made it. The gun shot a forced ball; that is, the bore in the barrel was smaller at the muzzle than at the breech. It would shoot a mile just as accurately as the finest rifle in the world. When held in the hand at a "ready" the weight was exactly balanced between the two hands; it was the easiest gun to handle in the manual of arms drill we have ever seen. It could be taken all to pieces to clean, and hence was little trouble to keep in order—quite an item to lazy soldiers.

We are safe in saying that another great war will never be fought by the United States with muzzle-loading guns. The Spencer rifle demonstrated the superiority of breech-loading repeaters. This, or an improved repeater, will be the rifle of future wars in the United States, and perhaps in Europe.

About this time the regiment began a system of instructions in the management of their horses in evolutions in squad, company and batallion drill, and of movements in line and skirmish drill, which perhaps had never been attempted by Federal troops before. It is safe to say that in this drill we had learned many valuable lessons from the rebel John H. Morgan; for this was actually his system of drill which we adopted. This system was afterwards modified and simplified a little, and adopted by all the cavalry service in the Army of the Cumberland, and is the basis of Gen. Upton's tactics now used by the United States Army, both infantry and cavalry.

We were not cavalry, but simply mounted infantry, a new branch of the service, which of course required new methods. Also about this time there was organized a corps of scouts in each regiment of the brigade, by taking one picked man from each company; all the scouts of any one regiment were under command of one Sergeant and one Corporal. Afterwards all the scouts of the brigade were placed under the command of a Commissioned officer.

On May 21st we turned over all extra baggage and had orders to move at a moment's notice, and Col. Miller says that the whole army had the same orders. Our picket lines had been frequently attacked during the last few days.

On the 22nd our brigade, and two guns of the 18th Indiana battery, made a reconnoissance, in force, of the enemy's front, and the left moved out south-east on the Manchester road. When near Hoover's Gap, the rebel videttes were driven in, the picket post was charged and some prisoners taken from two Georgia cavalry regiments. Company C was left here to menace the rebel camp, which was in plain view, and the column turned east. At every road leading toward the enemy the videttes and pickets were driven in and a company left to watch them; in the afternoon the head of the column reached the McMinnville road, where the command concentrated and moved back to camp, having reconnoitered one-third of the rebel front, causing great consternation in the whole rebel army. We had killed a few, captured a few and driven off the rest. Col. Miller said we returned to camp in fine style, which remark had a most exhilarating influence on the regiment. We were agreeably surprised to see what damage we could inflict on the enemy, and retire from our exasperated foe without being punished.

On May 24th we moved east to Readyville, and on the 25th made a march of 30 miles, captured a few prisoners and returned to camp on the 26th. On the 25th, private William Swift, company C, had half his head shaved, was drummed in front of the division, and sent to the penitentiary to work out the balance of his term of service, for deserting his post while on picket.

On June 1st companies E and B, under command of Capt. Kilborn, went to Readyville, and at midnight started to Woodbury to surprise a camp of rebels. While on their way a most terrific rain and thunder storm came upon them, which those on the expedition will never forget. When they reached Woodbury the rebels were gone.

On June 4th we moved early, taking the road to Liberty, regimental scouts in advance; we captured the rebel pickets at Auburn without making any alarm, and the column moved into Liberty. Two miles out the only rebel vidette on the road was shot and killed, leaving the rebel camp to our mercy. The brigade moves swiftly in a column of fours, the Seventy-Second in advance, Col. Miller at its head. The Scouts are thrown forward right and left as flankers, and rush into Liberty full sweep. The rebels are taken completely by surprise; their horses are unsaddled, they are quietly getting supper, and our sudden appearance causes a wild stampede. Our scouts did most of the firing. The brigade halted, but the Seventy-Second pursued. The rebels attempted to rally in Liberty; but they were so closely pressed that they broke and fled to the opposite side of Dry creek and began forming. With Col. Miller at our head, and never changing formation, we rushed down upon them in a steady gallop. This sort of tactics was new to them, and without waiting to fire a second shot they broke and fled from the field; we pursued them some distance and captured twenty of them. At sundown we abandoned the pursuit, returned to the brigade and went into camp, having marched 30 miles that day. The rebels left an immense amount of stuff in their camp, and strewn along after them in wild confusion.

On the 5th the Seventy-Second lay in camp, and the 98th Illinois went to Dark Bend on the Cumberland river. The 123rd Illinois took after the rebels that we ran out of camp last evening, had a fight with the enemy and drove them beyond Snow Hill, to Smitshville.

On the 6th of June we moved to Auburn, where Col. Miller made his headquarters. A detail of 20 men from each company, under Lieut. Col. S. C. Kirkpatrick, were ordered to scout towards Woodbury; deploying on each side of the road, they went to within five miles of Woodbury. The scout was lively and successful, resulting in the capture of a lot of stock. Company I broke a rebel soldier's thigh, and captured three others. The expedition returned to camp that evening. While we were out the teamsters and camp guard had a lively adventure. A party of rebels dashed into camp and tried to capture the trains. The men rallied and drove them away, but they carried one of our men with them. Our men mounted and gave chase with such zeal that they rescued their comrade, wounded three rebels and captured three others. When the rebels first charged on the camp, two burly fellows dashed up to John Hamelton, company I, regimental teamster, and ordered him to hitch up quick and drive out. "I won't do't" said John in his Irish brogue, "for this is Col. Miller's wagon, and I'll be dom'd if yees shell have it." At the mention of Col. Miller of course they wanted it all the more, and leveling their guns at John they said, "hitch up quick, or we'll shoot you." "Shoot an' be dom'd wid yees," said John, as he dived under the wagon bed. Two bullets crashed through the wagon bed as he popped up on the other side, but it was a clear miss. Swearing by all the Saints, he yelled out, "ye dom'd buggers!" seized his Spencer and brought it to a ready, and the rebels "left bery sudden," while John sent two or three shots after them.

On June 7th we returned to Murfreesboro with 60 prisoners, 320 horses and mules, and part of a captured wagon train. It would be impossible to name all the incidents connected with this scout, or the result of each company's work separately. All entered into the work with a zest, and each company was about equally successful.

June 10th. At six this morning a detail of an officer and 15 men from each company, started under command of Lieut. Col. Kirk, as we always called him, for Lebanon, while the remainder of the brigade moved on the road to Liberty; one north, and one north-east, and both 30 miles from Murfreesboro. The brigade got near Liberty half an hour by sun, and the Seventy-Second dashed into the place to find the enemy gone. Only one rebel was killed that day; the Seventy-Second went back and camped with the brigade. According to Col. Miller's notes an attack from Morgan was expected that night.

Lieut. R. C. Clark, commanding scouts on this occasion, says: We encountered the rebel pickets about two miles from Liberty, routed them and pursued them hotly, and were right upon them when we reached a point, just before entering town, where the creek is on the right of the road, and a very high precipitous cliff on the left with only a wagon road between. When we were fairly in this position we were fired upon from the cliff, which was so steep, and the enemy being directly above us, over shot us. There were 200 on the cliff

When the rebels dashed up to the cliff and ordered him to stop, he said John in his mind I'll be dom'd if I can't get the other side of course they thought John they said, and I'll be dom'd wid' it. commanded by a Major. To stop, or to try to turn and retreat, was certain death; so we dashed through and around the foot of the cliff, and came out right amongst them. Our men deployed, and as our Spencer rifles were fully loaded we did very good execution. The rebel Major called out that he surrendered, but our men were too much deployed to hear what he said. To enable them to hear, we gave the command to cease firing, and the rebels mounted and retreated, pell mell, we after them; we ran them through town and about two miles into the country, taking several prisoners. The number of old rebel haversacks and amount of corn bread scattered by the flying foe, along the road and through town, was immense. If my men had ceased firing when the order was given we could have marched the two hundred men in as prisoners.

We were called up before day (11th) saddled immediately and waited till noon, but no rebels came. In the afternoon we moved to Alexandria and camped over night. On the next morning (12th) we went on to Lebanon, where we met the detachment under Col. Kirkpatrick. They had been successful in collecting a very large lot of forage, horses, cattle and negroes. The negroes had recently taken to gathering in the vicinity of roads, and when the Yankee troops would come along would fall in and go with them. They had learned to take advantage of the emancipation proclamation. Some of these negroes were taken into the service of the officers, and some employed to cook and groom horses for the messes, and made themselves very useful, taking many a burthen off the soldiers. One man captured on this occasion, named Wyatt, or "Wallick," as we called him, stayed with company F until we were mustered out, and then crossed the Ohio river with us, at Jeffersonville.

We returned to Murfreesboro on the 13th. This was the last scout of the Seventy-Second north and east of that place, and Dr. Cole remarks that "the country is in a most deplorable condition, there being neither horse, forage nor provisions of any kind left in it." Duke's history of Morgan's cavalry says the same thing.

From the 1st of February, 1863, the brigade has been through the rebel lines 28 times, has taken 1,157 prisoners, 4,000 horses and a small army of slaves. In the last expedition we took 600 prisoners, 800 horses and 250 slaves; killed 10 guerrillas and mortally wounded Col. Grant. We have hung five and shot 15 rebels, including a Second Lieutenant, caught with our uniform on, as it was the order of Gen. Rosecrans to take the lives of all rebel soldiers found wearing Union uniform. The above is from Col. Wilder's report; in all this work the Seventy-Second had done its full share.

On the 20th we moved camp north-west of Murfreesboro, close to Stone River, and were busy until the morning of the 24th, in active preparations to take part in the forward movement of the Grand Army of the Cumberland. On the 23rd we were ordered to be ready to move next morning, at daylight, with 10 days' rations and 80 rounds of ammunition. Everybody in camp knew what this meant. We had been for months waiting and expecting the army to move forward, and the order for 80 rounds of cartridges assured us that the time had come at last.

Gentle reader, please imagine yourself in a position where you know that on the morrow you may enter into mortal combat with an enemy your equal, in which you know that the chances are that you instead of he may bite the dust. And suppose, too, that behind you are wife, children, father, mother, sister, brother and sweetheart, whom you have not seen for months, and may never see again. How you would like to give them a glimpse into your inmost soul! How you would like to assure them of your love and constancy as you stand upon this border of death-land! But you hesitate. You would not, for one moment, have them think that you even dream of such imminent danger, lest you give them anxiety and pain.

Whatever the feelings may be, or however different in different individuals, such orders always brought out the materials for writing; and on this evening, under the pressure of marching orders, thousands of tender missives were written to beloved ones at home. To write a few lines to their beloved ones was one of the last duties performed by soldiers in the field, before facing death. It seemed like speaking what might be our last words to them, and then we were braver, and could face death firmer. Often the order would come from our considerate commanders, who themselves were like us, "one half hour for letter writing," and then in two minutes thousands of pens were in motion, not writing of the perils of the situation, but speaking words of love and all the encouragement possible. It was amazing what cheerful letters could be written in the very face of death!

To our regiment the circumstances were peculiarly impressive. Our chaplain had resigned and gone home, and for months we had not heard the gospel of peace. But on the 14th of this month a new chaplain had come to us, and this evening preached his first sermon. How fully he realized the necessity of preparation for to-morrow! With what earnestness he presented to us the way of life! But we must not anticipate. Suffice it to say that, when the last notes of the bugle that sounded tattoo died away in the hills, and when the last light was put out well understanding well understanding all hazards.

light was put out in the lonely tent, each soldier lay down to sleep, well understanding what was expected of him on the morrow, and as well understanding what might happen to him; but ready for duty at all hazards.

In order that the movement, about to be made, may be more clearly understood, and the part taken by the Seventy-Second made plainer, a few remarks, as to the relative positions of the two great armies, are necessary.

When Gen. Rosecrans drove Bragg out of Murfreesboro, January 1st, 1863, Bragg fell back to the south side of Duck River, almost due south from Murfreesboro, and made that river his line of defence; and his front, or line of battle, took the general direction of that stream, which at that place is almost due west. The headquarters of Bragg were at Shelbyville, 12 miles south of Murfreesboro, his right wing rested on Winchester, and his left extended towards Farmington.

At the same time Gen. Rosecrans disposed his army as follows: The centre, the 14th corps, commanded by Thomas, in and about Murfreesboro. McCook's 20th corps as the right wing, to the southwest of Murfreesboro; and Crittenden's 21st corps as the left wing, to the north-east of Murfreesboro. The army had a general front to the south-east, or a little east of south. The pickets between the two armies, on the road from Murfreesboro to Shelbyville, were in sight of each other; while Morgan, during January and February, constantly scouted about our camp, often passing entirely around our army.

The scouting in which we had taken part, up to this time, had been directed to breaking up Morgan's command, and impoverishing the country, so that he could not subsist to the east and north of Murfreesboro. We had quite thoroughly done this, and now other work is before us.

Rosecrans opened the campaign by moving his right wing, McCook's 20th corps, south, making a strong feint on Bragg's centre at Shelbyville. The left wing, Crittenden's 21st corps, moved straight east, to Readyville, and thence south-east, to McMinnville. The centre, Gen. Thomas' 14th corps, moved south-east on the Manchester pike. Reynolds' division belonged to Thomas' corps, and Wilder's brigade to Reynolds' division. Our division moved first in the corps; our brigade in advance, and our regiment advance guard. This gives you the position, as nearly as possible, and shows you that we are directly in front. We now return to arouse the men we left sleeping in camp at Murfreesboro.

On the 24th of June the bugle sounded the reveille at 3 in the morning. Up, feed, get breakfast and move at daylight. We reach Murfreesboro and find that the whole army of 50,000 men have struck tents. What a change in one short night! One can never realize it till one sees it. Everything is loaded on wagons, and the regiments, brigades and divisions are rapidly taking their places in line. We move right on through the town, passing the horrible old camp in the hickory flats, and take the road for Wartrace, moving southeast on the Manchester pike. Companies A, F, D and I were advance guard of the regiment.

The weather was cool and lowering, and rain began to fall in the forenoon and continued all day, pouring down in torrents in the afternoon. The men were cheerful for all that, in broad contrast with the weather. We strike the rebel videttes ten miles out from Murfreesboro, and five miles from Hoover's Gap. We promptly charge the picket post, and they as promptly set out to spread the alarm. Soon a company of cavalry attempts to check our advance, and they, too, are driven as chaff before the wind. We kill one man, capture others, and take a flag inscribed: "Presented by the Ladies of Selma, Alabama." A coincidence: that in our first battle we should capture this flag, and almost two years after, in our last battle, we should capture Selma, and ladies who presented the flag, too, perhaps.

We press on. As the rebel force opposing us increases, we strengthen our skirmish lines, and bear down upon the retreating rebels with such impetuosity that the motion of our column is not checked until we near the mouth of Hoover's Gap, where we find line of rebel cavalry extending from one hill top to the other, across the little hollow through which we are moving. They open and keep up a constant fire on us from one end of the line to the other. Here Company C comes forward, and with A, F and D in line, and I and C in column, we give them such a push that they fail to rally at a line of breastworks and a cannon they had planted in the Gap, but run on at a fearful rate.

Company C here turned attention to some camps on the hill to the left, and captured a signal station with all its train, camp and garrison equipage. This station had first signaled Gen. Hardee that the attack was only by a small reconnoitering party of cavalry—a lucky mistake for us, leaving us in undisputed possession of the Gap. But we did not stop here. A, F, D and I, just charged right on in column after the retreating fugitives, who scarcely took time to fire a gun, chasing them into the little village of Beech, two miles beyond the Gap. Here the column checked up, and Lieut. Col. Kirkpatrick, who was in command, went into Jacob's store to get some caddies of tobacco, brought them out and began to distribute the tobacco to the men, while firing is still going on in the front between the regimental scouts and the enemy.

But hark! Just to our right and rear, a half mile away, a hundred drums begin simultaneously to sound the dread long roll. A Staff officer comes dashing down the road and yells to us, "get out of this as quick as God Almighty will let you!" We about face and move briskly towards the Gap, the rebels following and encouraging our efforts with repeated shots.

During the melee in which the four companies were engaged the head of column of brigade had passed through the Gap by the earthworks, and captured the piece of artillery. Col. Miller grasped the situation in a moment. This was the key to the whole position, and two hours later could scarcely have been charged and taken with 10,000 men. Col. Miller immediately sent Company H out on picket to the right of the road, and Company E on the same duty to the left, on a by-road, and formed the other four companies on the brow of the hill to the right of the road. All this time the rebel drums are beating the long roll furiously, which gives Col. Wilder the situation of their camps. The 17th is hurried up to form on the right of the Seventy-Second, the 98th Illinois still further to the right, and the 123d Illinois to the right and rear in reserve; our battery of mountain howitzers in front of the Seventy-Second and the 18th Indiana battery directly in our rear upon the highest ground.

The four companies come back in a hurry and take place in line;

the rebels following us cut off Companies H and E from the road. By this time two divisions of Hardee's corps, encamped to our right-front, scarcely a mile away, have gotten in line and send forward a cloud of skirmishers who soon strike Company H, and for a time its situation is perilous in the extreme. Just as the company began to fall back W. R. Clark was shot in the abdomen, the ball coming out at his back. Three or four comrades quickly dismounted, helped him on his horse and hurried him to the rear. The company by a circuitous route gained the rear, and took its place in the line.

By this time rebel skirmishers are at short range with our line; they come up in splendid style and in plain view. Our howitzers and four pieces of artillery open on them and pour volley after volley of grape and canister into their ranks, as they rush upon us with hellish and deafening yells. On they come, as if determined to take the battery without firing a gun. The Seventy-Second opens upon them with our seven-shooting Spencers, and for the first time they seem to wake up to the fact that they are not fighting cavalry. They stagger and fall back in confusion. The weight of the charge has struck the 17th. The sharp clatter of rifles is deafening. From some cause the 17th is soon out of ammunition and some commotion is visible. Now the 98th Illinois change front and come to the rescue, and the rebels are hurled back. Now the 123d Illinois move to the support of the 98th, and the rebels open on our mountain howitzers with a battery of rifled guns. Three shells in quick succession pass through our regiment; one cuts one of the gunners in two; another tears off the face of Sergt. Pike, of Company D, and another passes through the neck of an artillery mule.

As the rebels have more and heavier guns than we, our battery of howitzers limber up and get out of the way, and it seems now but a question of a little time when the 18th battery six-pounders will have to do the same. At this juncture the rebel infantry move upon us, outnumbering us five to one, but our splendid Spencer repeaters more than compensate for the disparity in numbers. When they close upon us the clash and crash of small arms is added to the deafening roar of artillery, and the din is terrific in the extreme. The struggle was desperate but brief. The rebel infantry are again sent staggering back. Their artillery yet hold supremacy and every shell they send over us and at our guns increases our anxiety and the peril of our situation; for if they silence our guns there's nothing to prevent them from shelling our ranks at their leisure. We are in extreme peril. A large chunk of railroad iron, thrown from a rebel cannon, strikes in front of Company D, near Sergt. Garrett's head, throwing mud at Drummond, Company I, one of the color guard, jumps to his feet, seizes and throws the shell down the hill, which explodes as soon as it touches the ground! Brave and timely deed. Our peril increases with every moment.

At this critical moment the 19th Indiana battery, Capt. Harris, with guns one-half caliber larger than those of the 18th, ten horses to the gun, came thundering down the road to our relief, the drivers urging the horses with whip and spur until they were frantic with fury. For once artillerymen are permitted to ride on their guns. Capt. Harris takes position and opens immediately on the rebels. As the guns belch forth fire and shot over our heads we feel great relief, and anxiously watch the telling effect the shots have upon the enemy, and in a short time the rebel guns are seen to limber up and move to a more respectful distance.

It is now almost sundown; we have been lying in the mud and water for nearly four hours—for the rain has come down in torrents all the time. We were not heavily engaged any more that day, and at dark were relieved by Crook's brigade.

It would take many more pages than we have to spare to note half the incidents of this battle, yet we cannot forbear speaking of a few. After dark we fell back and lay on our arms in reserve. All had done their duty so well that it is not possible, without being invidious, to give special praise to any. We have not yet ascertained what became of Company E, and will give their experience. Soon after they found that they were cut off two rebel officers came up to them, supposing they were part of the rebel force, and did not discover their mistake until it was too late for them to escape. Just then the rebel artillery began to rake their position and the skirmishers also began to fire on them. The company started to move across the woods and immediately came upon three little children who were bewildered in their efforts to escape from the dangers and awful noise of the battle; two little girls aged about seven and nine, and a little boy aged five. These were veritable babes of the woods. The girls could out-run the boy, but every minute would stop, turn and cry, "come on, bubby, come on!" Sergt. Wilhite, amid a shower of bullets, dismounted, helped them over the fence, placed the boy between the girls and started them towards a house, out of the range of the fire, remounted his horse while the bullets rattled against the fence and rode away unhurt. At such an act of tenderness would not the angels smile through the smoke of battle and protect the brave man who did it? Company E got out in safety and took place in line while the battle raged. There is not space to speak of hair-breadth escapes.

The mortal wound of Sergt. Pike, in the face, has been spoken of, and to see him lying in the mud and rain, clawing the mud with his hands and ever and anon picking at the shreds of flesh and shattered bones of his face, was horribly distressing. His face was all shot off. It sickens us to write of it. Death soon came to the brave man's relief, and we all thanked God to see our poor comrade out of his agony. Lieut. Cravens informs us that he stood over Sergt. Pike, a short time before he died, and said, "Pike, don't you know me?" The poor fellow muttered, "O, mother, poor mother! What will she do?" He spoke no more, and soon expired. He was a noble man and the support and pride of his widowed mother. He was buried near the line of battle where he fell.

Clark, of Company H, has been mentioned as being shot in the abdomen; Dr. Cole says: "The ball went through the skin on the abdomen but did not penetrate the muscles; passed round his body and came out at the back, exactly opposite the point it entered, just as though it had gone straight through him. He soon got well and served out his time." Other casualties were Sergt. James O. Peed, Company G, a good and brave man, mortally wounded in the left lung. Private Peter Moore, Company A, musket ball through the left shoulder. Daniel Long, Company E, broken right fore-arm. P. C. Burnham, Company D, bayonet wound. John R. Bennett, C, musket ball through left lung. E. Banister, D, slight wound on knee. A. J. Hubbard, B, musket ball in left shoulder. Wm. Grismar, K, wound in thigh. J. R. Rutherford, B, slight wound in head. J. K. Sheets, K, wound on shoulder.

The most impressive event of the day was the killing of Chaplain Eddy. The regimental hospital was established over the hill, in rear of our regiment, and the Chaplain was near it helping with the wounded; a shell of the enemy fired at the 18th battery passed over it and over the hill, and through the Chaplain's body, killing him instantly. We have said that the night before he had preached his first sermon to us in camp at Murfreesboro, exhorting us to be prepared for death. To be taken from us thus, on the first day of service, in the brave discharge of his duties, was a matter of sorrow to every heart. His name will be ever dear to the Seventy-Second.

We quote from Col. Miller's notes: "We were under fire for five hours. This was our first battle and the men stood well. We had three men killed and 20 wounded, some of them mortally. We were relieved by Crook's brigade after dark, and lay on our arms in the mud that night."

On June 25th the whole of the 14th army corps came up and formed line where we were yesterday. Skirmishing commenced early, but our troops were content to hold the splendid position gained, for the capture of which we claim the honor belongs to our brigade. We lay in reserve all day and the rebels showed their spite by throwing shells at our forces, while the clouds poured down rain.

The 26th opened with rain, and we moved east and south up a fork of Duck River, passing through some narrow defiles where we pick up a few prisoners. The rebel army seems to be falling back. We camp for the night in six miles of Manchester.

On the morning of the 27th we were in the saddle early, and dashed like fury into Manchester, surprising the place and capturing 300 prisoners and a lot of Commissary stores. We remained there all day while part of the brigade made a reconnoissance towards Tullahoma. The 14th corps came up in the evening, and the rain continued.

On the morning of the 28th we set out from Manchester to raid on the Chattanooga railroad, going by way of Hillsboro, Pelham and Hawkinsville, 45 miles to Decherd. Duck and Elk rivers were so swollen by the rains as to swim all the mules and small horses; at one place we carried the artillery ammunition across on our horses, and at the other made a raft to ferry the artillery over. We reached Decherd at nine o'clock at night. The bulk of Bragg's army was at Tullahoma, 15 miles north of this place, and hence we are right in the rear of Bragg's army. We found Decherd garrisoned by a small force of rebels in stockade, and scattered them with a few shots from our howitzers—Lack-ee-n-guns, we always called them, because we used mules to haul them, and often took them to pieces and strapped them on the backs of mules when we traveled very hilly country, as was frequently the case.

While this was going on Capt. Rice started through the village to give directions to scouts who were burning the water tank, tearing up the railroad and working all possible mischief in a great hurry. He had dismounted and was quietly leading his horse when suddenly some rebels began to fire on him from a stockade; the bullets rattled against a fence and scared his horse, which jerked loose from him, leaving him in quite an unpleasant predicament, and his chances for Libby prison good. His horse did not run from him, but just as he caught the bridle another volley, and another rattle of balls against the fence, and again the horse broke away. This was repeated, the Captain's hair standing on end, until the horse got out of range of the bullets, and then the Captain mounted and went out of there like a bird flying. He regards this as his most daring feat during the war, but confesses that he was a little scared.

The first thing captured was the rebel mail. The depot was burned, a short section of the railroad torn up and a bridge burned. The command then hurried away six miles, north-east, to a point on the Cumberland Mountains, and as Records has it, "ambushed for the night;" that is, simply stopped in the bushes and lay down to sleep, holding our horses' bridles in our hands. We had put in another hard day's work in the rain, and our beds were on the mountain side on the sharpest of rocks. The mountain was so steep that we had to get our feet against the trees or rocks to keep from slipping down. And had not the surroundings been so desperate it would have been funny to see us try to sleep. You see a big, stout, long-legged soldier lay down flat on his back, his legs stiff and his feet braced against a tree; in two minutes he is asleep, his muscles begin to relax, his knees fly up, and down he goes a-straddle of the tree. With many the remainder of the night is worn away in sliding down the hill and climbing up again; while others more fortunate, find a hole or depression, the rain still pouring down, and two hours later they are called up to find themselves in water six inches deep.

On the 27th we were in saddles by daylight and moved on a by-path to the top of the mountain, as we were apprehensive that the enemy had thrown a force between us and Pelham. When near the top of the mountain a fearful thunder storm came upon us. We were so high, or the clouds so low, that we were in the clouds, and the thunder was as often below as above us. The average soldier took but little interest in this grand sight, knowing only that the situation was uncomfortable. To many of us the sublimity of the scene dispelled thought of discomfort or danger. God seemed very near.

The want of rest and sleep was telling on us, and we were constantly falling asleep and reeling in our saddles like drunken men. The route was almost impracticable, and the howitzers had to be pulled up by hand. When we got to the top of the mountain we could see reinforcements pouring in to Decherd. The rebels had been struck suddenly there and were fearfully scared, not knowing whence the Yankees came, or whither they went.

On the top of the mountain each man was ordered to take a sheaf of wheat for his horse, and the column moved forward on the trot to University Heights, whence a detachment of the Seventy-Second and 98th Illinois, Col. Funkhouser in command, hurried to Cowart to burn the trestle work of the Memphis, Chattanooga & Charleston railroad, but on getting in sight of the place found rebel troops pouring into it by thousands, and returned to the column. While Col. Funkhouser's detachment was gone the brigade tore up the railroad at Tracy City; as this was a short road, running to a coal mine, the object of tearing it up was never visible to the naked eye.

It still continued to rain. Many horses gave out and were killed, while others were left to fall into the hands of the rebels. The constant rain had swollen the Elk River out of its banks and the bridge at Pelham was our only chance of crossing; and should the enemy destroy that, our chances of escape were slim. Just before going down the mountain a detail from Company I, Lieut. Vance in command, was pushed forward to the bridge and arrived in time to drive off a rebel force that had just reached the bridge. Our boys tore up the floor of the bridge, carried the boards to our side, built breastworks of them and held the fort until morning. We remember the names of but Munson, Wyatt and Allen, of Company I, who took part in this brave and important work. The brigade went into camp immediately on coming down from the mountain, and for the first time since leaving Manchester we had a chance to make coffee.

On the morning of the 30th we succeeded in getting across the bridge with but one man wounded, although Wheeler's rebel cavalry were pressing us hard. In actual damage done to the enemy this expedition was a failure, but in unifying the brigade and giving each man confidence in himself and his officers, it was a grand success. The rebels had hitherto had it all their own way in raiding railroads; this expedition demonstrated that we were just as competent to raid rebel railroads as rebels were to raid Union railroads. This raid had a very demoralizing effect on Gen. Bragg, and he began to evacuate Tullahoma in two hours after he heard the report of our guns at Decherd, thinking he had been flanked by the whole army. We failed to say it rained all day the 30th.

July 1st was the first day since we left Murfreesboro that it had not rained. The brigade scouted towards Wartrace, in the rear of the retreating army. Having traveled 300 miles in a little over three days, and lost over 500 horses, we were told we could have a short time to recruit up a little.

On July 3d we went to Wartrace and went into camp on the ground recently occupied by the rebels. The strongest imagination could not exaggerate the vast accumulations of filth which we saw here and at many other places. Our men often remarked that it seemed as if the rebels expected us to drive them away from their camps, and for our especial discomfort left as much filth behind as possible. Looking back over nearly a year's service we see that the very first thing we have done, on going into camp, even for a few days, has been the digging of sinks; and from our first entrance into the service until now we have digged enough sinks to make a respectable Suez Canal, were they all joined together; or a ditch of sufficient capacity to drain the Kankakee swamps. But up to this time we had never seen a rebel sink; they seemed to revel in filth, and a thousand mingled stinks must have been sweet perfume to their nostrils.

The deluge of rain which had fallen in the 10 days past had soaked the ground until the whole face of the earth was a reeking sea of carrion; in many places, as we walked over the ground, we could hear and see the sputtering water through which the noxious gases arose to high heaven, blending a thousand filthy smells into one, which no christian olfactory could withstand. Countless thousands of green flies flitted about with nasty, lazy drone, like the hum of a thousand spindles. These flies were constantly depositing their eggs on the ground, on the leaves, on everything—which the broiling sun soon hatched into millions of maggots, which wiggled until the leaves and grass on the ground moved and wiggled too; and in a short time they hatched into flies and added to the swarms in the air, and laid more eggs, &c. We are willing to risk our reputation as a faithful recorder of historic facts in saying that we have seen acres and acres of ground covered with leaves that were in a constant quiver from the motions of the maggots that infested them. Every member of the Seventy-Second will remember our camp on "Maggot Hill" as long as he lives. There is an abundance of evidence to prove all we say. The nuisance was so intolerable that we were given permission to clear off a new camp a mile away, which was done by details on the 5th of July. This camp was near Rowesville, and we moved to it on July 6th.

For several days we did little but forage for horses. Shortly after moving to Rowesville our good Dr. ——— went to a house near camp and spoke for his dinner. By good luck the lady of the house had a chicken to fry. The air around the cabin was filled with the savory smell of the frying chicken, and the Doctor's mouth began to water in anticipation of the change from h. t. and s. b. to such a delicacy. But unfortunately for the Doctor, just when the fowl had reached the stage of brown that indicated a job well done, the lady of the house stepped out of the door, and so did the chicken, skillet and all. There was some foul play in the matter, and a man in Company H could tell who did it, but as he didn't sign his own name we will not give it.

The whole country was full of wheat and oats standing in the fields uncut, and foraging for feed for the horses was a matter of pleasure and a light duty; but food for ourselves was scarce; aside from a few apples, potatoes and blackberries, the country afforded nothing. All our government rations had to be hauled from Murfreesboro in wagons, the roads were a vast swamp, and it was next to impossible to get any hauling at all done. Blackberries were fortunately plenty, and with these, and what hard tack we got, we could manage to live.

On the 4th of July there was hardly a cracker in the regiment—and it is a dry Fourth without crackers—so we sought to make up our deficiency in rations by an extra issue of o-rations. This Fourth will long be remembered as one of the bright days of the gloomy years of the rebellion. We were in very high spirits in our Tennessee camp, even if the maggots and green flies were sporting in “shoals and oceans;” and had we known that Lee had been defeated at Gettysburg, and that Vicksburg had surrendered, our joy would have been unbounded. Perhaps we sniffed the good news from afar, and inhaled the spirit of rejoicing which made the loyal North ring and roar with delight and thanksgivings.

We gathered in the afternoon at headquarters, and Col. Kirkpatrick, who was the only politician in the regiment, was called out for a speech. He responded in one of his happiest efforts. When he spoke of the “dear old flag, the stars and stripes” in a grand burst of eloquence he said, “they should wave over the land of the free and the home of the brave when the last mother's son of the rebellion should be dead and rotten, damned and forgotten.” We cheered him to the echo. He was followed by Sergt.-Maj. B. M. Thompson, and for an hour we had a grand oration. This occasion was an oasis in the many dreary days of our service.

While having a few days quiet in camp in this sweet-scented country, we have leisure to state that at Murfreesboro the Seventy-Second conceived and brought forth a poet, in this same Sergt.-Maj. Thompson, who became an institution in our history. From the opening of this campaign to the close of the war the regiment made no important move that he did not reduce to song, in such lively verse that, if published, would hand the regiment down to posterity as the embodiment of all that is chivalrous, generous, dashing and good. His poetry is not in elegant style, but quite forcible in expression. It would be a pleasure to insert it all in this volume, in connection with the circumstances described in each piece; but poetry fills space so rapidly that we are compelled to leave it out. We have it all before us, and should the sale of this book justify another edition we promise to insert it in full.

On July 10th we moved camp to near Normandy, on Duck River, nine miles from Tullahoma.

On the 13th Col. Miller took a detail of 20 men from each company in the regiment and went on a scout, north and west through Shelbyville and Unionville, to see if the rebels had all left the country. We traveled 75 miles, captured a few rebel prisoners and returned on the 15th.

On the 16th we scouted to Elk River to see if the rebels had all crossed, and found none. Also on the 16th the Seventy-Second and 98th, Col. Wilder in command, went on a scout to destroy some saltpeter works near Lynchburg, Tenn., and returned on the 17th. It was on this scout that Corp'l John T. Haynes, Company I, captured the famous old fighting cock "Methuselah" which was never whipped in many fights. The old bird furnished much amusement to those who enjoyed it, and many a rooster went down before his gaffs, after he became a member of the Seventy-Second.

On the 18th of July the Regiment was paid off from January 1st to the 1st of May, four months.

On the 21st Col. Wilder, of the 17th, went home and left Col. Miller in command of the brigade.

On the 22d a detachment of the brigade under the gallant Col. Funkhouser, of the 98th Illinois, who was always on hand for his share of the hardest and most dangerous duty, consisting of part of the 92d and 98th Illinois, and 10 men and a non commissioned officer from each company of the Seventy-Second, Capt. C. G. Thomson in command, went on a scout to capture horses for the 92d, and also to fill up losses of horses in the brigade. This detachment passed through Shelbyville, Unionville, Chaplain Hill, Bythursday, Columbia and Hunt's Store, part of the country where our troops had never been, and secured stock and forage in abundance.

As this was a very important scout, in which Sergt. Steward of Company A says 1,154 horses and mules were captured, we record a few of the many exciting personal incidents, begging pardon for not giving all the vast pile that lies before us. The command moved at 8 a. m., passed through Shelbyville and camped four miles from Unionville. After the precautionary information that we were to move through a section of the country infested by bushwhackers—furloughed rebel soldiers—we were commanded to begin to forage for stock and able bodied negroes. Each non-commissioned officer was train as a guard, and a rallying point for the bands of scouts. The allowed to take all his 10 men except two, who were left with the pack train and guard moved along the main road while the scouting detachments took any direction they preferred, all to report to the officer in command at the train at certain points agreed upon for camping overnight. Sergt. Steward, commanding the detachment from Company A, reports the capture of 30 horses and mules during the scout; taking this as an average for the capture of each detail from the Seventy-Second, would make their aggregate capture of horses during the trip 300, or three horses for each man on the scout, which is about correct. Records, of Company I, furnishes the best account of this scout. Of the work on July 23d he says: "My detail had to serve as rear guard for the column until late in the afternoon when scouts began to come in. when I got permission from Capt. Thomson to draw from detachments of other companies and go foraging. I had just learned that some men were running a threshing machine on the south side of Duck River. Taking two of my own men and two others, our whole party being five, I started. Several parties that day had tried to get on the south side of Duck River but failed on account of high waters. We reached a point from which the machine could be seen in the distance. I told the men I wanted to go for that machine. Others of our regiment came up at that point and said they would go and see us try it, but didn't feel like running any risks themselves. We struck the river at Maury's Mills, but the bridge was in ruins. A man at the mills told us that there was a ford just below, but it was deep and dangerous. Just then I saw a horse hitched which I was told belonged to a boy who was then in the mills. By this time several squads had come up and we went down to the ford. The river looked so formidable that I wished the men would decline to go further, but one of them said, "go in and try it," and rather than back out I put into it. The water ran over my horse's back but I pushed ahead and called out, "come on!" With a whoop they dashed into the river and all got speedily over in safety.* The boy had crossed in a canoe and was flying off on his horse to alarm the threshers; but we pursued and soon overtook him, and learned from him that the threshing was on Grey's plantation, that Grey was a Captain of company of rebels and that his company was guarding the threshing. I directed some of the men to take charge of the horse and boy, but we had not gone far until I saw the boy running across a cornfield, and saw in a moment that this was likely to spoil the arrangement if we failed to reach the machine before the boy, and that we might get our hair raised. We dashed off in a gallop, and as we neared the machine raised a whoop and cheer, making as much noise as a regiment.

The noble guards, three times our number, broke for the cornfield, jumped the fence and disappeared in a trice. We stripped the horses and mules, 12 in number, put the darkies upon them, and fearing the rebels might find how few we were, slip back through the corn and pay us their respects, we dashed back, crossing the river in safety." The rebels having lost their negroes and animals were left to their own reflections, and we never heard how Capt. Grey finished up his threshing. We moved on through Unionville and Chaplain Hill and camped that night on Rutherford Creek.

On the 24th (we quote John B. Davis, Company D,) our advance was fired on by bushwhackers, two of whom we captured. We advanced to Columbia, where we had a slight skirmish, and turning back camped on the farm of a Maj. Allen, who was then in the rebel service. On this march we were instructed to state to all persons from whom we took property that if they would come to camp and establish their loyalty their stock should be returned to them. We had native guides with us who knew those who were loyal.

We give a sample day's scouting by the detail from Company D, which illustrates the work of the whole command. On leaving Spring Hill we came to a house where a young lady was holding a horse by the bridle. On entering the house we found a revolver, and saddle pockets filled with apples. Coming out we asked the lady for the horse; she threw her arms around his neck and declared we never should take him. We disengaged her arms, took the horse and moved on. The next place was a large plantation where we found three mules, two in the gin house and one in the lot; we unhitched the two from the gin and went for the one in the lot, when the old lady came out and said, "Lo'd A'mighty! you'uns don't want that mule, he's done 25 years ole!" We took him for eight years old, and moved on.

We next secured a fine horse, the owner seeming to care very little about it. One of the native guides came up and told us that the owner of the horse and himself had hidden together from the rebels in a cave for six months. We wouldn't take such a loyal man's horse and returned it to him. We next took a horse from the rebel Col. Haines. Next came to an old woman who was weeping bitterly; it wouldn't be so bad to take her horses but we had taken her negroes too. We asked her if she was a Union woman. "No," said she, "when the Union split I split too!"

This scouting party returned to camp at Roseville, on the 27th, found the brigade had gone to Decherd, followed and reached there on the 28th, bringing in 1,000 horses, 1,500 mules and 1,000 negroes.

We lay in camp at Decherd from July 27th to August 16th, the longest period of inactivity since we were mounted. Aside from a little skirmish drilling and foraging we did nothing. The 10th Indiana was at Winchester, a few miles from us, and we had a pleasant season of inter-visiting.

As this date completes our first year's service and marks an epoch in our history, we note the changes in our regiment since our last review up to January 8th, when we went into camp at Murfreesboro:

Capt. R. B. Hanna, Company H, had been detached as Provost Marshal, on Gen. Reynolds' Staff. At Decherd station, Company H was detailed as Provost Guard, at Gen. Reynolds' head quarters. Sergt. Maj. W. K. Byrns, has been promoted to Adjt. of the regiment, to succeed A. A. Rice, who has been previously mentioned as promoted to the rank of Captain and made A. A. Gen'l. on Gen. Reynolds' Staff. Chaplain Jesse Hill resigned April 13th, succeeded by Rev. John Eddy, of whose brief service and death by a cannon shot at Hoover's Gap we have spoken. John B. Johnson, Assistant Surgeon, resigned May 3d. Capt. Milton Newton resigned February 1st, and Andrew Klepser succeeded him. Frank B. Everett, 1st Lieut. Company C, resigned February 16th, and Edward A. Cutshaw succeeded him. Jno. N. Insley, 1st Lieut. Company E, resigned February 9th, and Lewis C. Priest succeeded him. Capt. Moses Burch, Company F, resigned March 23, and James L. Dalton succeeded him. Orin E. Harper, 2d Lieut. Company F, dismissed March 1st, and Johnson Parker succeeded him. W. R. Jewell, 2d Lieut. Company G, resigned from sickness, May 19th, re-entered service in July next as Captain of a Company at Indianapolis; the company not being ordered to the field, he resigned and accepted the Chaplaincy of the 7th Indiana Infantry, and served until its time expired. Jacob Gladden succeeded him. James M. Stafford, 1st Lieut. Company H, resigned June 11th, and John C. Scott succeeded him. John Watts, Captain Company I, dismissed January 19th, and Wm. H. McMurtry succeeded him. Capt. Hiram B. Collins, Company K, resigned April 21st, and Richard H. McIntire succeeded him. John W. Gaskill, 2d Lieut. Company K, died at Murfreesboro, February 20th, succeeded by James W. Davis. Making 11 commissioned officers resigned, one died and one killed.

In Company A, non-commissioned officers and privates, died 2, discharged 6. Company B, died 6, discharged 19, killed 1. Company C, died 3, discharged 6, drummed out 1. Company E, died 10, discharged 12, killed 1. Company F, died 6, discharged 9. Company G, died 4, discharged 11, deserted 1. Company H, died 1, discharged 11. Company I, died 4, discharged 10. Company K, died 2, discharged 6. Total for the Regiment: died 38; discharged 90; killed 3; deserted 1; drummed out 1. Making the total loss of the Regiment, from January 8th, 1863, to August 16th, 1863, in officers, non-commissioned officers and privates, 146. To this add the loss of the first six months, 98, and the total loss for the year is 244. We left Indianapolis with 978, and in this first year we have lost just two more than one-fourth of our entire command.

With perhaps one or two exceptions, every officer had resigned on certificates of disability, precisely the same ground upon which non-commissioned officers and privates were discharged. Perhaps 90 per cent. of this heavy loss was caused by the horrible filth pit at Murfreesboro, before spoken of. In addition to the losses above alluded to, there were enough absent in hospitals to make a total loss of full 300 men and 9 officers; deduct those transferred and on detached duty and there are about 500 men in the regiment for service.

At Castillian Springs, in 1862, there was a general overhauling of the non-commissioned officers of the entire regiment, nearly one-half being dropped from their places and others substituted; but after that, in most cases, officers were advanced in regular order of promotion.

We begin our second year's service in our camp at Decherd. Our summer's service on horse back in the pure air, and on fresh rations most of the time, has worked out the poison of Murfreesboro from our blood. The camp at this place was a beautiful one, situated on a gently sloping hill-side abundantly shaded, near a clear stream of water, which flowed from a large fountain which was almost bottomless and burst up from a fissure in the rocks, furnishing water for bathing, washing, and all other purposes.

Many of our comrades who had been left behind sick came back to us at this camp, and bathing in the pure water and the abundant use of peaches and blackberries, which were plenty, soon put them all in the best of fighting trim. We never saw the command in better spirits. We cannot forbear relating an anecdote, showing on what intimate terms the men and officers were. The stream above mentioned ran between our horse quarters and regimental headquarters. Wm. Grismar, Company K, was put on guard by the side of the creek. Col. Miller was then in command of the brigade and Lieut. Col. Kirkpatrick in command of the regiment. Just at daylight Col. Kirkpatrick came out of his tent, stretched himself and caught sight of Grismar, who immediately cocked his gun and pointed to a big drift pile in the creek, and called to the Colonel to come there. The Colonel started and Grismar motioned for him to keep as quiet as possible. The Colonel came up on tip toe, Grismar still holding his gun leveled at the drift, and motioned for the Colonel to get down; and all ears, eyes and attention the Colonel got down on his knees, began to peer under the logs and whispered, "what is it?" Grismar whispered back, "just tear that drift pile open and you will find the dearest biggest mouse you ever saw." The Colonel said, "that'll do," tossed Grismar his pocket-knife and told him to say no more about it.

Bragg began his retreat from Tullahoma on the night of June 28th, and never stopped until he put the Cumberland Mountains between Rosecrans and himself, making his headquarters at Chattanooga. Rosecrans followed and camped his army at the western base of the mountains, his left resting on Manchester, centre at Decherd and right south of Winchester. It took Rosecrans until the middle of August to get up supplies enough to justify him in climbing the mountains.

On August 16th we broke camp at Decherd, moved along the base of the mountains four miles north and began the ascent. Every man was ordered to dismount and lead his horse. It was two miles from where we started to the top, steep and rocky. As we had not walked so far for a long time we were very tired when we reached the summit. All the lovers of grand and beautiful scenery were richly paid by the sublime and far-reaching view spread out in the direction whence we had come. We passed University Heights and camped at Tracy City.

It may be proper to state that the plan of the campaign was to make a strong feint at and above Chattanooga, while the main body of our army was to cross the Tennessee River away below Chattanooga, and come up on the east side of the river. The portion of the army making this feint was our brigade, now composed of the 17th and Seventy-Second Indiana, the 92d, 98th and 123d Illinois, and the 18th Indiana battery; and Gen. Wagoner's brigade of infantry. Gen. Wagoner started from Manchester when we started from Decherd, but we had to lie in camp at Tracy City and wait for him to catch up.

On the 18th we moved forward, and on the 19th, near noon, reached the edge of the mountain bordering the Sequatchie Valley, which is one of the finest and richest valleys in the world. The rebels had every road and crossing leading out of it to the west strongly picketed, and the valley was full of the enemy. We struck the valley at Sherman's Crossing, the 92d Illinois in advance. The rebel videttes on the hill reported our advance in time for the rebels in the valley to concentrate and get ready for us by the time we descended the mountain.

When the 92d struck the rebel pickets it came promptly to a halt. This so exasperated Col. Wilder that he ordered it to stand aside and ordered the Seventy-Second forward. As soon as we reached the head of the column Col. Miller took Companies A, F, D, and I—

Company, I, Capt. McMurtry, advance guard—and struck across the valley. The command had not gone far until the road forked and it was necessary to send a company on each branch. Company I kept straight across the valley, which was about three miles wide at this point, while Company A made a lively chase after some rebels on the other branch of the road, in which Albert Sigers killed a rebel. Company D run on to a school-house where some rebel soldiers were holding a conference over some Union Home Guards they had just captured. The rebels had decided that the home guards should die, but Capt. Thomson came upon them so suddenly that it "broke up the meetin'"; turned the tables completely, and the Captain left the home guards guarding the rebels. When Capt. McMurtry, with Company I, reached Sequatchie River, they found it a wide, deep stream, having bluff banks, each side skirted with thick brush and timber; the road struck the creek and turned squarely to the right, passing down the stream some distance to a ford. Here the rebels undertook to make a stand, and opened fire on I, as they came around a curve in the road, but the Company without a halt or a return of a shot dashed like furies down to the ford, across the stream, up in the rear of the rebels, opened on them with their Spencers, killed one, captured five, and chased the terror stricken enemy north-east, through the open country, until they reached the foot of the mountain, where the rebels scattered and hid in the brush. That was a brilliant dash performed in less time than it takes to tell it.

This rapid movement brought Company I across the valley in a brief time and with little noise, and left the next rebel post, further up the creek, in ignorance of our movements; this post was on a road leading north-west; they had dismounted, barricaded the road with rails, and were behind them with their backs toward us, eagerly straining their eyes watching for the Yanks to come, but, Yankee like, we slipped up behind them and they knew nothing of our approach until we were covering them with our fatal Spencers and demanding their surrender. They made no resistance, and were all captured.

The brigade went into camp at Dunlap. Kings never lived better than we did here, for grapes, peaches and roasting ears, abounded. At Dunlap we left all our trains and loaded all our traps and five days' rations upon our pack mules, and early on the morning of the 20th of August, we started up another range of the mountains, called Waldron's Ridge, which runs straight south to the Tennessee River, at Stevenson and Bridgeport. This range was much higher, steeper and more difficult of ascent than the other one had been; and as we had to walk and lead, it was an uphill business, and very exhausting before we got to the top. We moved rapidly, and as the ridge is only 20 miles across the summit, we reached the eastern brow that day by 4 p. m.

Clark, in command of the Seventy-Second scouts, says: On this march, and when within about a mile of the foot of the mountain, Col. Wilder gave me a guide and told me to take my scouts and those of the 17th and go down the mountain, by what is known as "Wild Cat Trace," and get in the rear of the rebel pickets at the foot of the mountain on the road. He said that he would hold the command one hour for me to get position. I did so. I placed the 17th scouts on the first road and my scouts took the second road. We dismounted, got ready, and had just got position when the advance of the column was fired on by the pickets. The fire was returned and here came the pickets, pell mell, past us; well, not exactly past us, for we fired into them, and some were wounded and a great many thrown from their horses and captured. I remember one who jumped over the fence into a clump of bushes, when Amos Hollingsworth jumped over after and caught him by the coat collar and seat of his trowsers and threw him out in the road. We learned by the people whose houses the frightened rebels passed after being fired on, that there was not a man of them wore a hat, but that their hair stood as erect as porcupine quills.

The Seventy-Second was in advance, A, F, D and I, advance guard. We struck a heavy picket post just at the foot of the mountain, and as we charged them about one-half ran up the valley and the other half down it. The four companies above named chased the squad that turned north 12 miles before we stopped, but as our horses were already tired and theirs fresh when we started, we didn't catch any of them. Soon after we started in pursuit of the rebels the horse of John Young, of I, dashed ahead of all others and came close up to the fleeing foe. One rebel halted and leveled his gun at Young; and Young, without halting his horse, brought his Spencer to his shoulder and fired at the rebel. At this instant Young's horse stumbled and fell, and the rebel fell from his horse severely wounded by Young's shot. Young was not hit by the rebel's bullet, but he was almost crushed by his horse falling on him; his leg and arm were broken and he was otherwise bruised. As soon as Young and the rebel recovered they talked the matter over very coolly, as they lay near each other, until they were taken up. The rebel died of his wound, and Young is badly crippled for life, yet by his energy and tact he makes his way very well in the world and has a good business at his home in Oakwood, Illinois.

We remained all night on picket right where we stopped. The remainder of the brigade went into camp soon after getting down from the mountain, at Poe's tavern, 15 miles above Chattanooga.

At daylight on August 21st the brigade moved very rapidly down the valley to Chattanooga, the Seventy-Second scouts driving before it the pickets of the enemy at several points, captured 30 prisoners and came near capturing the steam ferry boat which carried the retreating pickets across the river, killing the ferryman. The regimental scouts captured 100 horses and mules that day.

The brigade came up and took position on the bluffs overlooking the city, on the north-west. Capt. Lilly immediately opened fire on the city with two guns. That was some sort of fast day or holiday in Chattanooga, and when our shells began to drop among them there was such a stampede for the fortifications as you never saw. The rebels replied with a battery of 32 pounders, a shell from which killed four horses and shattered the leg of a gunner, all belonging to the same section. Dr. Cole amputated the leg, but the soldier never rallied and soon died. Our brigade kept up a strong demonstration in front of the city until dark, and then fell back five miles and camped in Dry Valley.

Companies A, F, D and I, which chased a squad of rebels 12 miles and picketed the road on the night of the 20th, moved early on the morning of the 21st, being 27 miles above Chattanooga; we scouted slowly down the river hunting all the fords and crossings, and getting acquainted with the country generally. We reached the camp of the regiment at nine o'clock that night.

Dry Valley was not so very dry after all, for numerous beautiful mountain streams meandered through it, the land was rich and forage abounded. We remained here until the 29th of September, and enjoyed as much solid fun as we ever did during the same length of time while in the service. Every afternoon our battery would go to the bluff overlooking the city and shell it vigorously; the regiments of the brigade took turn about going down on foot with the battery, leaving our horses behind to give the rebels the impression that we had an infantry force as well as artillery and cavalry. We constantly kept a strong picket force all along the river.

The ridge our battery occupied each day was nearly a mile from the river. Off to the right of our position, and about half way down the hill, was a little frame house. After a few days' shelling with but an occasional shot from the rebels, the thing became monotonous and our men and officers became stacy and venturesome. About the 23d, Col. Wilder and his Staff Officers, in order to get a better view of Chattanooga and surroundings, concluded to go down and get into the house. In the squad were Col. Wilder, Capt. Shields, Lieut. Crick and Lieut. Newell, of the Topographical Engineers. This was rather a bold adventure, but they succeeded in getting into the house from the back way, as they supposed unobserved. The back of the house sat on the ground, and the front part, next the river, was three or four feet from the ground. Everything was quiet about the house, but the officers saw under it a very large old sow, serenely sleeping. The Johnnies had observed all their movements and turned a 32-pounder upon the house, and just as our heroes had secured the best positions at crack and crevice with their field glasses, and had begun to survey the situation, the Johnnies let drive at them. The 32-pounder was well aimed and well timed, and came under the house "thud," literally blotting the old sow out of existence, and at the same instant exploding, and quicker than you could wink, pieces of the floor, hair, entrails, fresh pork and old iron came boiling out through the roof of the house like lava from a crater. To say that the officers rolled out of that house faster than hornets ever tumbled out of a nest, would be putting it rather mildly; and to say that they made good time up the hill would be true. Lieut. Newell jumped out of the window, and in just two minutes by the watch was going over the brow of the hill, when Capt. Rice halloed "hello, Newell, what's the matter with you?" Without checking up Newell halloed over his shoulder as he ran, "O! there's nothing the matter with me, but it was terrible hard on the old sow."

On August 25th our regiment went on a reconnoissance to Friar's Island, 12 or 15 miles from our camp. At this place there is a ford that can be crossed at ordinary stages of water. We found the ford strongly picketed and guarded by a battery of artillery protected by earthworks. We exchanged shots across the river, which is at this point three-quarters of a mile wide, but did not attempt to cross.

When we marched from Dunlap we left our teams behind and Company E to guard them. About the 26th Capt. McMurtry gathered together all the pack mules of the brigade and started back over Waldron's Ridge for rations. From our camp, straight across to Dunlap, it was 30 miles; we made the trip across and back in two days. This was repeated several times by other companies, till the fourth of September, when our teams also came across. Reconnoissances and scouting up to Friar's Island were made every day by some of the companies. On the 29th Col's Wilder and Miller went up and talked with the rebels across the river. went up there one day, dismounted, left our horses out of sight and slipped down close to the river to see what chance there was of getting across. The enemy discovered and fired on us awhile with their muskets, but did us no harm, and when they saw that we didn't mind it they turned a piece of artillery on us and we hastily got out of the way. Two or three miles further down we saw a man washing his feet on the opposite side, and as he didn't know we were about, we fired a shot or two simply to impart to him a knowledge of our presence. He received the news violently and tore up the earth as he pawed up the hill. Again, two or three miles below this, we saw some rebel pickets on the other side and began to talk with them and ascertained what regiment they were of, how long they had been stationed there, and various other bits of information. They were so friendly that we invited them to come over, pledging ourselves not to harm them. They at first agreed to come, and we dismounted, left our guns and went down to the river to receive them. They modified their proposition and said they would meet us half-way; we also accepted this proposition. The river was a mile wide and seemed very shallow, and Sergt. Magee pulled off his clothes and waded to the middle of it. The men who were doing the talking now said that their officers would not let them come. We may here mention that our guns were so superior to theirs that our balls easily went over the river, while theirs rarely came across.

We have been a farmer all our life, and point to the prairies of Indiana and Illinois with great pride as producing the best corn in the world; but we saw corn on our trip down the river on that day beside which the best fields of Illinois and Indiana are dwarfs. The rows were three and a half feet apart both ways, two stalks to the hill, and such stalks we have never seen since. As we rode between the rows on a large horse with a forage sack before us, most of the ears were just a convenient height to gather, but to reach many ears we had to stand up in the stirrups. One ear cut in two four inches from the butt measured four inches in diameter, and each grain was three-quarters of an inch long. We were getting our entire living off the country, and in such a valley neither man nor beast was likely to suffer.

The geological formation of this valley is peculiar, and we have seen nothing like it anywhere else. Right at the base of the mountain is the beautiful little Dry Valley in which we are encamped; between this and the river is a range of hills, many of them almost as high as the mountain itself. These knobs are chiefly composed of a species of quartz-rock, nearly square in shape, from the size of a walnut to that of a man's head. These rocks make the hills the most difficult to climb of any we ever ascended. When the scouting party above named got opposite Chattanooga we climbed a hill till we could look down into the rebel works, and could tell by the columns of dust that the rebel troops were moving east.

Returning to camp that evening we noticed a fine lot of sheep in a field near the picket post. We had strict orders not to leave camp after night, but the fat sheep were too great a temptation, and a party of us determined to risk a venture to capture some mutton. In going to the field a point of the mountain had to be climbed to avoid the pickets, and the square stones rolling under our feet with their sharp corners made the trip so toilsome that we had earned the mutton before taking it. The sheep had lain down very near the picket post, and the puzzle was how to get them away without alarming the picket. After a few whispers we crawled up near the sheep and began to toss pebbles at them; when a sheep was struck it got up; when about half were up a stone struck the bell-wether and he jumped up in fright, rattling his bell like the beat of a long roll until it reverberated among the hills. The pickets were up and all attention in a moment, and we thought our mutton prospects withered as we heard the pickets speculating as to what was up. We lay as flat as snakes in the grass and still as stones until the pickets got over their alarm; the sheep in the meantime had all come to their feet, and by skillful tossing of stones we got them away from the picket post and drove them to the further end of the long field. There were six of us. We cornered the sheep and each made a dive for one. It was our fortune to seize the bell-wether by the collar. At a single bound he jerked us off our feet, and we fell sprawling on the ground, holding to the bell-collar like grim death as we went rolling with the sheep down the steep, rough hill for some rods—the sheep on top half the time—but we were a full match for him, being on top the other half, but were terribly bruised on the square rocks. Our grip was failing, but two comrades came to the rescue and the prize was secured. Three others got good ones. We skinned them in a twinkling—practice makes perfect—but now the question is how to get them into camp. They were big, fat and heavy—the bell-wether being the fattest sheep we ever saw. When strung on a rail it was all two of us could do to carry one of them. As we went to the field the side of the mountain to be ascended was not so steep as the one to be descended, and we reached the top without serious mishap; but the trouble began when we began to descend. Lights were all out in camp and we were not certain of the direction. We began to descend, and every little bit the man at the front end of the rail—and we happened to be at that end—would find himself sitting down and scooting down the mountain on the half-sole of his pantaloons, the sheep lapping about his neck, and the man who should be at the upper end of the rail lapping round the sheep.

Such service tried a soldier's bottom. When about fifty feet from the foot of the mountain the men at the upper end of the rails seemed to let all holds go at once, and men and sheep came rolling down upon us like an avalanche, and before we could check up we came down in a heap against Col. Miller's tent, bruised, bleeding, and almost as badly skinned as the sheep. When we struck the tent the Colonel started up in a terrible fright and hallooed, "Ha, there!" We held our breath for a moment, and the Colonel concluded that a convalescent horse had stumbled over the tent ropes, and he fell asleep again. We picked up our bruised and mangled forms, and also our sheep, and silently stole away. We had mutton for the inner man and mutton suet to mollify our wounds as long as we remained in camp.

On the 26th of August Wagner's brigade came into the valley at Poe's Tavern, and made the strongest possible demonstration on the enemy along the river. On the 28th Wagner moved down near us and shelled Chattanooga, the rebels replying but once with a small gun, and from the little attention paid us we were led to think that they had decided our attack was but a feint, and were concentrating against our main army that was now across the river at Shell Moun, Bridgeport and Stevenson, 35 miles below. In order to disabuse the rebels of this idea our trains came over the mountain and Gen.
Wagner moved his brigade to the top of the mountain opposite the city, put up tents in plain view of the rebels, and burnt brush and log heaps as if a whole corps were in camp.

On the 5th of September, to add to the demonstration, Gen.
Hazen's brigade was sent into the valley at Poe's, and shelled the woods across the river. This seemed to have the desired effect, and our pickets early that night sent information to camp that the rebels were preparing to cross. This was a cause of serious alarm to our brigade, as Wagner was on a mountain two miles high, and could not possibly get down in time to aid us, while Hazen, 15 miles above, could give us no immediate aid. In this situation a corps of rebels, crossing in the night, might drive us from the valley and capture the two other brigades.

The night was dark and favorable for the rebel advance. Our wagons were all loaded and the teams hitched to them; the pickets were doubled and a regiment sent to the river in front of the city.

An unusual amount of hammering and noise continued on the rebel side opposite to us, and our teams were hurriedly started up the mountain. It was our lot to be on picket; the noise continued late into the night, our brigade lying on arms; but the day dawned and no attack was made. We afterwards learned that the confusion was made by the rebels preparing to evacuate the city.

The solid comfort we had in this valley, notwithstanding our exposed position, has been spoken of, and also the square stones, and the fun we enjoyed. We will now relate an incident that combines all these, and then we are ready to go out of this valley of fatness.

After leaving Decherd, on the 16th of August, we never had our tents up until we reached Maysville, Ala., October 24. Each mess, or camp family, would hitch their horses in a circle in the woods and cook, eat and sleep in the center of the circle, so in case of alarm each could mount most speedily. To get a shady place to hitch we had to go on to the hillside, the level ground being in cultivation. Company I was encamped in regular order, mess 1 up the hill about 100 yards from the road, 2 about 25 yards further down, 3, to which we belonged, 25 yards further down, and 4 next the road; the hill was so steep and rough that we had to scrape away the rocks to get a place level enough to sleep on. Every night numbers of horses would get loose and wander about the camp; besides there were scores of convalescent horses that had given out and were turned loose to live or die. One night one of these horses stumbled over some fellow, away up in mess 1, and he jumped up in a fright and ran for his life; this scared the horse and it came down through mess 2, in a full run. We were awake when the man in mess 1 scared the animal and knew from the rattle and crash of rocks that it was coming straight for our mess, who were all sleeping in a row—we in the middle—and as the horse swept over mess 2 they all jumped up and hallooed as if Satan himself were after them. We jumped up and called to mess 3 "for God's sake save yourselves." From the additional fright given the horse in mess 2 he came upon mess 3 like a whole regiment of cavalry; the men jumped up half awake, the horse stumbled and fell right into our bed, rolled over and went rolling down through mess 4, landing in the road at the foot of the hill. For a moment the hair stood straight up on top of our heads as we realized how near we came to being crushed to death; but in a moment more the thought of the ridiculous figure we cut in jumping out of bed with nothing but our hog-hair shirts on and running with our banners cracked in the wind to get out of the way of the old horse overcame our fears of the Indians. Other companies were on picket half an hour.

On September 10, 1862, our brigade dug a trench off the mountain to the Chicamauga Creek, and made every possible advantage of the point of the mountain. The rebels replied with an empty shell.

On the morning of the 17th we crossed the river to the island, where our scouts were to get a channel on our side except just below the island is nearly a dead end, their lead gained the island. The artillery did good work, the rebels were driven away. The reason for the success of Chattanooga on the 23d was that they took possession of the island about to cut off the river. Glaze says a passage was made across the river, and the batteries were planted in the trees. In the late afternoon the rear of the column was never seen. There were no shots, but the enemy was seen. We found a few tents probably belonged to the camp stools. Of the importance of saltpetre beds we have no more to speak; history is full of the fall of Vicksburg, and the South, where the overcame our fear, and we all roared with laughter and hallooed like Indians. Other companies joined in the jollity and kept it up for half an hour.

On September 7th our brigade moved up to the mouth of North Chicamauga Creek, near Friar's Island, and Wagner's brigade moved off the mountain to the river in front of Chattanooga. In the night our brigade dug some trenches and built lunettes for the guns, and made every possible preparation for crossing at the ford just below the point of the island. Our battery shelled the enemy and they replied with an energy that let us know they were ready.

On the morning of September 8th the brigade made ready to cross, the 17th having the advance. Its scouts undertook to swim to the island, which is about 80 rods long and 20 wide, and covered with timber, which screened our movements. The object of the scouts was to get on the island and pick off the rebel gunners. The channel on our side was not so wide as on the other, but quite deep, except just below the point of the island. The river just below the island is nearly a mile wide. In the efforts of the brave scouts to get over, their leader, Joseph C. Wilson, was drowned, but the others gained the island and a vigorous skirmish immediately opened. Our artillery did good work; but in a short time, to our agreeable astonishment, the rebel artillery limbered up and deliberately moved away. The reason for this retreat was that the rebels evacuated Chattanooga on the night of the 7th; Crittenden's corps immediately took possession and began to move east and south, and was about to cut off the rebels in our front; hence they left and we crossed the river at our leisure, Company C in advance. Capt. Glaze says a passing column was reported to the Colonel across the river, and the battery being close at hand opened on them over the trees. In the language of a contraband picked up on the road in the rear of the column, "Sich scramblin' to git away from de shells" was never seen. Company C could not resist the chance for a few shots, but the enemy were in a hurry and did not return the fire. We found a few tents and some camp equipage near the forts which probably belonged to Gen. Hardee, as his name appeared on some of the camp stools, which Capt. Glaze took charge of.

Of the importance of this capture of Chattanooga, with its wealth of saltpetre beds and coal, by a flank movement, we have not space to speak; histories of the war will inform the reader that it was hailed with delight at the North as of little less importance than the fall of Vicksburg, and that it had a most depressing effect in the South, where the position was regarded as invincible. After the fall of this city the Southern people said the great gate to the invasion of the South was opened wide.

The only guns fired on Chattanooga were those of which we have already spoken. Crittenden entered the place without firing a gun. On page 140 of Ridpath's history of President Garfield is the following explanation :

"On August 16th began the movement of the army across the mountains towards the Tennessee River. The paramount effort in the manner of the advance was to deceive the enemy as to the real intention.

"The army made the movement along three separate routes. Crittenden's corps, forming the left, was to advance by a circuitous route to a point about 15 miles south-west of Chattanooga, and make his crossing of the Tennessee River there. Thomas, as our centre, was to cross a little farther down, and McCook 30 miles further to the right.

"These real movements were to be made under cover of an apparent one. About 7,000 men marched directly to the river, opposite Chattanooga, as if a direct attack were to be made on the place.

"The extent of front presented, the show of strength, the vigorous shelling of the city by Wilder's artillery, the bold expression of the whole movement, constituted a brilliant feint. Bragg was deceived again. Absorbed in the operations in front of the place, he offered no resistance to the crossing of the Tennessee River by the main army."

We have already told the part the Seventy-Second took in this famous attack on Chattanooga, by which Bragg was so alarmed that he forgot to guard his flanks. At Decherd, in his rear, we had helped to hurry him out of his stronghold at Tullahoma; at Dry Valley, in his front, we have held him until he is flanked out of Chattanooga. The reader can judge whether the "Lightning Brigade" and the Seventy-Second have a right to be proud of this part of their history. We have helped to open the gate in this Switzerland of America, for the invasion of East Tennessee, Alabama, Georgia, North Carolina and Virginia, and must now "move on."

On the 9th all our trains came up and crossed at the same ford we did, and we drew seven days rations, and on the 10th we moved on Ringgold and camped just inside the Georgia State line.

On the 11th, just as we got in column on the direct road to Ringgold, a brigade of infantry came on to it from Chattanooga; our regiment was in the rear and the commander of the infantry asked who we were, and we told him; he turned to his Adjutant and said, "tell Col. Wilder who is here, and to push them." Our advance was then skirishing with the rebels at Ringgold, and before the Adjutant had time to reach the head of the column we began to move, passing through Ringgold, where the depot and vast piles of commissary and quartermaster's stores were on fire. We saw no more of the infantry General who said "push the n." When through Ringgold we turned east through a gap in Taylor's Ridge where two long trestle bridges were burning. Passing through the gap we turned south and were met by a few shells thrown by the retreating rebels; our battery took position, fired a few rounds, the rebels limbered up and pushed on, we following, our advance and the rebel's rear skirmishing at intervals. As we neared Tunnel Hill, some 10 miles south of Ringgold, the scouts and Company A in advance, the rebel cavalry suddenly came sweeping down upon them in full charge. Col. Kirkpatrick, seeing the dust raised by the advance of the enemy, shouted, "Company A, they are charging us! dismount and give 'em h—l!" Company A, without taking time to form line, dismounted and took to the fence corners, Col. Kirkpatrick shouting his battle cry all the while to cheer them on, "d—n 'em—d—m 'em—shoot 'em in the guts! go for 'em!"

Company A poured such a stream of well directed bullets from their Spencers into the advancing rebels that they quickly wheeled and dashed away beyond the range of the fire. At this point one rebel was killed. Company A met and repulsed them gallantly and handsomely. A mile further on the column came to a halt, the brigade dismounted and formed line of battle, and prepared to fight on foot, the Seventy-Second on the right. The line moved forward until a position was reached from which we could see right into the mouth of the railroad tunnel. Between our line and that tunnel there were thousands of rebels. It was near sun down and our only safety lay in keeping up a bold front. It seems that the enemy had purposely been drawing us on, and were now waiting for us to charge them, with the expectation that they would take us all in. We did not charge, but held them in check until after dark, quietly fell back to our horses, moved back behind a large hill and were ordered not to unsaddle or build fires. Companies E and K of the Seventy-Second were put on picket duty and were in plain view of the rebels all night, and could hear them talking in camp.

On September 12th, by 3 a. m., we were quietly called up and as quietly mounted our horses and rode away, carefully keeping in the pine woods, concealed from the rebels. Companies E and K were left in a very uncomfortable position, for as soon as morning dawned the rebels began to fire on them. Capt. McIntire, of K, was in command, and immediately began to prepare to follow the brigade. Placing part of Company E under command of Sergrts. Remley and White, as rear guard, they slowly retired, the rebels closely pressing them. Our men showed great coolness and courage in disputing every inch of ground and retarding the advance of the rebels until the command got well out of the way. During the gallant affair almost every man in Company E received close calls, but all got off safe. Some may ask, "why did not the rebels rush up and capture these two companies?" The answer to this question covers all such questions: The rebels did not know but these companies were acting as mere decoys to draw them into the ambush of a strong Union force; for that reason the rebels moved cautiously. Had they known that E and K were left alone, and the command on the retreat, they might have charged, surrounded and taken them; but that is just what they did not know. Rash commanders have often dashed on to a little force of the enemy to take it, only to find themselves surrounded by a superior force and compelled to surrender.

Our brigade moved back to Ringgold fully convinced that we had met the enemy in force at Tunnel Hill, and expected to find the infantry there which were following us yesterday. return with them and make a more determined attack on the rebels; but the infantry were gone. It was the belief of Gen. Rosecrans that the rebels were in full retreat and all we had to do was to press them. The magnitude and results of this mistake will be more fully spoken of further on, and it is mentioned to explain the difficulties the Seventy-Second encountered that memorable 12th of September.

At Ringgold Col. Wilder had orders to report to Gen. Reynolds division, to which we belonged, and was informed that the division was at LaFayette, or would be that night. We immediately marched for LaFayette on the road that runs nearly south, on the west side of Taylor's Ridge, and not many miles from the road we were on the day before, that road being on the east side of the ridge. We knew nothing of the exact situation of the rebel troops, but were confident they were not retreating, but calmly awaiting a favorable opportunity for battle. We proceeded on the road above mentioned, moving rapidly, and by 4 p. m. had made 15 miles, our regiment being rear guard. At that hour we suddenly heard heavy skirmishing ahead, and the column came to an abrupt halt. This was some six or eight miles due west of Tunnel Hill, and at the crossing of the road leading to Lee & Gordon's Mills. The 17th Indiana held the advance, Capt. Boswell commanding the advance guard. After skirmishing half an hour the column was still standing. A staff officer came and told Col. Miller to send forward four companies of the Seventy-Second, and A

F, D and I, were ordered forward under Col. Kirkpatrick, rode to the front in a gallop, on the east side of the road, to near the head of the column, and turned off on a by-path to the east. A half mile out we dismounted, formed line of battle and moved to the south-west, our regimental scouts in advance as skirmishers. It seemed that we had marched almost a mile when we came to a long and rather steep ridge running north-west, the side next to us sparsely covered with stunted jack-oaks. We had moved on pretty quick time till we reached the foot of the ridge and the scouts about half way up it, when the commander, R. C. Clark, Company I, called out, "halt!" We did so, and could hear an ominous noise over the ridge, and we knew the rebels were coming; and the vital question was which should reach the top of the ridge first. Clark sang out, "deploy and charge!" Immediately 10 men were going up the hill like the wind; we followed at double quick. Just as our scouts disappeared over the ridge we heard a volley, and the quick reply of the Spencers bade us hurry up. Company I deployed forward as skirmishers; in two minutes we reached the brow of the hill out of breath and staggering. The first volley from our scouts threw the rebels into confusion, and they hesitated a moment, but seeing the small number of the scouts they again pressed forward. In a minute our scouts must have fallen back or been captured, when Clark again commanded, "dismount and take to trees!"

By this time Company I, on the ridge, had dressed the line and moved forward; at that moment we heard a most fiendish rebel yell, and they came up the hill like a whirlwind; but we had beaten them and were ready to receive them. What were our scouts to do between two forces bent on each other's destruction? We feared to fire lest we should kill our own men. There and then we witnessed an act of the coolest courage we ever expect to see. The scouts fully realized the situation, mounted their horses and dashed out to the left when the rebels were in fifty feet of them; and strange to say not one of them got a scratch. Clark's horse was shot.

By this time the rebels were in fifty yards of us, and Capt. McMurry, with revolver in one hand and sword in the other, commanded "fire!" and we did, and never stopped until we gave them our seven rounds. That was the last word ever spoken by the brave Capt. McMurry; for just as he gave the command they raised their fiendish yell and charged us again, and the Captain fell pierced by three balls. George Brooks also fell mortally wounded and Jacob Allen fell severely wounded, his leg being broken. The rebels checked up to reload, and were close enough to see how few we were, then dashed at us again, and we should have been quickly swallowed up had not the three other companies just then come to our relief. Company F was behind and in a few feet of our lines. The rebels belched another volley of death upon us; Company I had almost all gotten behind trees, and F being in plain view at short range received the force of this fire, before which nine strong men fell. Had F wavered or faltered for one moment, under this terrible fire, we must all have been lost; but with Capt. Dalton at their head firmly commanding, "steady, boys!" they never stopped till in line with I, and then every man went to work with such earnestness, and steady, cool determination, that the woods seemed a vast sheet of fire. Companies A and D poured in a steady, destructive fire, from left-oblique, which proved the grain of coffee that broke the camel's back, for the rebels broke in confusion, ran down the ridge, and we poured a leaden hail storm into their backs, sweeping down many of them.

It had not been thirty minutes since our scouts started up that ridge until this fight was over. But what terrible bloody work in that half hour! It was our fortune, in less than a month after this fight, at the battle of Farmington, to capture a part of this same rebel force that fought us that day; and also two years afterwards, just at the close of the war, to pass over this battle field. We do not hazard exaggeration when we say that for disparity of numbers, severity, and loss of men engaged, the whole history of the war scarcely furnishes a parallel to this battle.

On our side there were just the four companies and our regimental scouts engaged; there was scarcely an average of 40 men in each company, or about 160 men all told; while opposed to us was a brigade of four full regiments; estimating 250 men to each regiment would make seven rebels to each one of us. Yet not a man of our little band faltered or thought of danger; and had the host against us been ten times greater, and had they lapped around us and swallowed us up, we doubt if a man had thought of running. A few incidents will show the terrible severity of the rebel fire. The writer was near Capt. McMurtry, who fell at the first fire of the rebels. Our company was on open ground. We opened on the enemy with all the speed we could command, emptied our Spencer of its seven loads, and stepped behind a small white-oak tree less than a foot in diameter to reload; just as we were ready to give them another seven shots, Company F came into line with us, the rebels opened fire again and nine men in F fell within ten feet of us, and our little tree was struck three times at less than our height. We tell you, if ever there is a time when a man wishes he were as thin as a board, it is when in a place like that was

In addition to the killed and wounded in Company I, Company F lost Geo. W. Mathis, Thomas Cozod, John A. Nixon and Elisha Holycross, all killed; and had the following wounded: Harvey Schoonover, mortally; Geo. B. Stump, severely in right arm; Wm. A. Schoonover, severely in left side of face; John Munson, flesh wound in left hip. The name of the other man wounded in Company F we did not get. In Company A Joseph Edskin was killed, and the following wounded: Sergt. James Robinson, mortally; Harrison Gaumer, left upper arm, severely; John McArdle, left thigh, severely. Two others, whose names we did not get, were wounded slightly. Making a loss of 8 killed and 10 wounded, a total loss of 18, inside of fifteen minutes. Company D fortunately lost none. We killed 30 rebels dead on the field; the number wounded we do not know.

The sun was sinking as in a pillar of blood in the west, and from our position on the high ridge we could see, a half mile over on the road on our right, that the rebels were thick as thieves. We could see their orderlies and officers riding furiously about forming line for a charge on our head of column to our right and rear; and an occasional shot from our skirmishers over there told us that preparation had been made to receive an attack. We had up to this time no opportunity to get the least idea of the situation; but the longer we stayed the more painfully apparent it became that we were in a most dangerous and exposed position, and we marveled that we had been sent out there. Rebels enough were in plain view to eat us up, and a very slight move on their part would have cut us off, and we wanted to be relieved. Our dead and dying lay just where they had fallen. We had straightened up our lines a little in advance of where we fought, and lay on the ground watching every leaf and twig that moved in the wind, expecting momentarily that the "Johnnies" would charge us again. But they didn't come. In a few moments the sun is down and twilight creeps over us in the smoky forest, and we are commanded to gather up our dead and wounded and fall back as noiselessly as possible.

With chagrin at thought of sneaking away from our enemies, and grief at the loss of our comrades, we gathered up our dead and wounded and carried them down to the cross roads. Our wounded we put into ambulances, and our dead we lay in a row on the porch of a large white house which stood near the cross roads. It was dark, and the numerous camp-fires in nearly every direction admonished us that we were in the midst of a powerful enemy and had no time to lose. In this day of peace, when friendships are rarely cemented by dangers shared in common, it will hardly be possible to realize with what overwhelming grief we looked upon that row of nine brave men, with Capt. McMurtry at their head, for the last time, and turned away without the privilege of burying them or shedding our tears over their graves. As to Capt. McMurtry, he was the writer's Captain and particular friend, and we loved him as a brother. He was a brave man and a general favorite in the regiment, and beloved by all who knew him.

The question was, how to get out of this; and it is not too much to say that Col. Wilder was much confused and did not know what to do. Finally Col. Miller got us mounted and moved on the road leading west, the Seventy-Second in advance of the brigade. We had not gone over a mile till we heard a sharp "halt! who comes there?" Before the man who uttered it knew what he was about our scouts relieved him of his gun and brought him to Col. Miller. From this prisoner the Colonel learned that there was a division of rebels camped not more than a mile ahead of us, and concluded that it would not be safe to go further on that road. But what shall we do? Col. Miller rode back to a house and pressed in an old citizen to pilot us out of that. The citizen objected and said he didn't see how he could, as there were rebels camped in every direction we wished to go. The case was desperate, and the number of shooting-irons near the old gentleman's head persuaded him to make the effort. The fence was opened on the north side of the road and the regiment moved through the field, Company E advance guard, Sergt. Wilhite in charge of the advance. When in the field we plainly saw the rebel camp fires to the left on the road we had abandoned. We moved in a north-west course, and when a mile from the road could also see rebel camp-fires on our right, and it was strange that we had not that afternoon run into the rebels camped there. After going a mile further Capt. Kilborn, of Company E, in command of a detachment of prisoners, was ordered to build camp-fires on a high ridge, as if the command were going into camp; everything was dry and the fires were easily built; but we marched steadily and briskly on, and at midnight struck our pickets a mile east of Lee & Gordon's Mills, passed inside the lines and immediately lay down to sleep without putting out any pickets, for the first time in many long months. We felt very sensibly our narrow escape from capture.

And now that we are safely out of it, it is proper to go back and explain how it happened that we were thrown upon the ridge where we had such a sharp fight with the rebels.

The first step in the explanation is, that our brigade had run full into the rear of the rebel Gen. Polk's corps, and Col. Wilder thought we were opposed by but a small number of the enemy. The fight we have described was half a mile southeast of the intersection of the Ringgold and LaFayette road and the road from Tunnel Hill to Lee & Gordon's Mills. We were marching on the Ringgold and LaFayette road for LaFayette when our column met the rebels precisely at Leet's tan-yard, not far from Rock Springs, and the fight was always called the battle of Rock Springs. The first intimation Col. Wilder seemed to have of the whereabouts of the rebels was when his advance guard run on to them at these cross roads. He saw that they were in such great force that he could not attack them with a shadow of success, and to retreat would be equally hazardous. He wanted, just then, to be in supporting distance of the left wing of our army, but how to get there was the serious question, as the rebels were on the only road leading to Lee & Gordon's Mills, and his advance had failed to move them from it. Now, what was to be done? In this dilemma he sent back four companies of the Seventy-Second to guard against attack from cross roads behind, and ordered us to move off to the east, and then to the southwest, and attack the rebels in the rear, in hope of compelling them to abandon their position on the road leading to the mills. The movement was successful, at the fearful cost of blood which has already been told.

We return to camp inside our picket lines. It was about 1 o'clock on the morning of the 13th of September when we lay down to sleep, and about 3 in the morning we were aroused by very rapid picket-firing. We saddled immediately, but the firing ceased. We took breakfast, and shortly after sun-up moved out in the direction in which we had heard the picket-firing. When three miles out we formed line of battle and moved east for some distance, passing over the ridge on which Capt. Kilborn built camp-fires last night. We now had an explanation of last night's heavy picket-firing. The force we fought on the cross-roads did not know we had slipped away from them until we had all gone. They followed, and coming to the camp-fires on the hill they quietly surrounded them, and at daylight charged the supposed Yankee camp with such fearful yell and discharge of musketry as to arouse us in our safe camp within our picket-lines. We could see their tracks in the ashes made as they marched in line of battle, side by side, in regular order. They had an easy victory in capturing Yankee ash heaps, but didn't enjoy the Yankee trick. That was Sunday, and we lay in line of battle all day, skirmishing at times very heavily, while skirmishing and artillery firing was in progress off to the right between the infantry and the rebel division we had seen in our front the night before. Late in the evening we fell back to the west side of Chicamauga Creek and went into camp not far from Lee & Gordon's Mills.

During the day a strong reconnoissance of infantry from Crittenden's corps, to our right, had met the same division we did on the night of the 12th, and had demonstrated that the enemy were in force in front of Lee & Gordon's Mills; therefore our infantry fell back behind the creek and never after attempted to move in that direction.

It must be borne in mind that the last four days have been such busy ones, and so full of interesting events, that we had not had a moment's time to forage. This is saying a great deal, for it must, indeed, be a busy time with a man of the Seventy-Second if he don't find some time to forage; and this evening, as it was known that we were going into camp, foraging parties sallied forth in swarms. The infantry was between us and the enemy; some of the parties had to go a long way, and in their rambles some of them fell into the hands of Gen. Rosecrans' body guard and were arrested as stragglers and taken to the General's headquarters. Without coming out of his tent the General inquired who they were. The officer informed the General that they claimed to be Wilder's men. "Impossible," said the General, "Wilder's whole command is captured and now on the way to Libby prison." The officer told the General that they persisted that they were Wilder's men in fact. The General then came out to see them, and when assured that they were of the Seventy-Second Indiana, he was astonished beyond measure, and said: "Wilder's men beat the devil, anyhow." Turning to the officer he said: "Take them to Wilder; he's the only man in the army who can manage them." In the squad there were some from nearly every company in the regiment, but more from I than any other. These were led by Corpl. (afterwards Orderly Sergt.) Wakeman. On their way to Wilder's headquarters they resolved to get even with the officer. When they reached Col. Wilder he simply asked what regiment they were of, and when told they were of the Seventy-Second he simply pointed and said: "You will find Col. Miller over there," and the officer started in that direction. A happy thought struck Corpl. Wakeman, and when near the Colonel he motioned to his comrades and they closed up on the trot and came to a front face, and, before the officer had time to think, Wakeman dismounted, saluted the Colonel, turned to the officer and said: "Col. Miller, permit me to introduce to your acquaintance Capt. Smith, of Gen. Rosecrans' staff." Col. Miller caught the idea in a moment, and as he advanced to take the Captain's hand he simply motioned to the boys and said: "You men as straggled the best farce."

On the 14th lay at Crawfish Mills. We staid that afternoon since leaving the 15th, as we used some rest in three weeks foraging and and said: "You can go to your quarters." This attempt to punish men as stragglers when they were only foraging turned out to be the best farce of the campaign.

On the 14th we made another effort to get to our division, which lay at Crawfish Springs, 15 miles southwest of Lee & Gordon's Mills. We started early and reached the division by the middle of that afternoon, and most of us saw our knapsacks for the first time since leaving the Sequatchie Valley, a month lacking two days. On the 15th, as we had been in the saddle for a month, we were promised some rest, and accordingly washed our clothes for the first time in three weeks, and put up our dog tents. The 16th was spent in foraging and shoeing horses.
