VI. NATIONAL CEMETERIES

The legislative history of national cemeteries currently within the National Park System is not as clearly defined as that found in other sections of Appendix I. The origins of the national cemeteries in the National Park System comes from the War Department's General Orders No. 33, of April 3, 1862, which read:

[Section II] In order to secure, as far as possible, the decent interment of those who have fallen, or may fall, in battle, it is made the duty of commanding generals to lay off lots of ground in some suitable spot near every battle-field, so soon as it may be in their power and to cause the remains of those killed to be interred, with headboards to the graves bearing numbers, and where practicable, the names of the persons buried in them. A register of each burial ground will be preserved, in which will be noted the marks corresponding with headboards.

The Act of July 17, 1862 gave the President the authority, “whenever in his opinion it shall be expedient, to purchase cemetery grounds and cause them to be securely enclosed, to be used as a national cemetery for the soldiers who shall die in the service of the country.” By the end of the Civil War, 14 national cemeteries had been established pursuant to this act; however, none of these original 14 remains in the jurisdiction of the National Park as of the date of this publication.

Shortly after the end of the Civil War on April 9, 1865, teams were formed by the Quartermaster General to exhume the remains of Union dead from the battlefields and camps and rebury them in national cemeteries. On July 3, 1865, General Orders No. 40, directed that reports be filed on the number of interments registered during the war “giving the localities, dates of battles, and dates of interments.” Because this order resulted in less than 30 percent of the internments being recorded, it became necessary to collect and analyze battle casualty reports for the unrecorded burials. General Orders No., 65 on October 30, 1865 required quartermaster officers to submit reports on the “location and condition of cemeteries known to them” and “recommendations of the means necessary to provide for the preservation of the remains therein from desecration.”

Congress gave its approval of the reburial program through the joint resolution of April 13, 1866:

Resolved. . . That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby authorized and required to take immediate measures to preserve from desecration the graves of soldiers of the United States who fell in battle or died of disease in the field and in hospital during the war of the rebellion; to secure suitable burial places in which they maybe properly interred; and to have the grounds enclosed, so that the resting-places of the honored dead may be kept sacred forever.

This act was seen as a stopgap measure, and it was not until February 22, 1867 that President Andrew Johnson approved an “Act to establish and to protect National Cemeteries.” This was followed on July 1, 1870 by an Act of Congress authorizing the United States to take title to any national cemeteries where the States had given their consent, and on May 18, 1872 by an Act authorizing the Secretary of War to appoint superintendents. These three acts are reprinted in this section of the book.
Since 1972, the National Park Service has managed 14 national cemeteries, at sites different than the original 14 mentioned above. 10 of the cemeteries now under Park Service jurisdiction were transferred from the War Department to the Department of the Interior by Executive Order 6228 of July 28, 1933. Subsequent to 1933, the National Park Service assumed responsibility for four more national cemeteries. A list is provided at the end of this section, showing the date of establishment of each of these cemeteries and the dates they were transferred to National Park Service jurisdiction.

The national cemetery at Chattanooga, Tennessee, which was originally transferred to the Department of the Interior by Executive Order 6228, was transferred back to the War Department in 1944 by Public Law 470 of the 78th Congress, (58 Stat. 797, Chapter 524).

Subsequent to Executive Order 6228 of July 28, 1933, President Franklin Roosevelt issued Executive Order 8428 of June 3, 1940, which resulted in the transfer of Custer Battlefield National Cemetery in Montana (now part of Little Bighorn Battlefield National Monument) to the National Park Service. For the text of this Executive Order and other historical information, see p. 331 of the 1946 volume of Proclamations and Orders Relating to The National Park Service.

And in case the Secretary of War shall not be able to agree with said owner or owners upon the price to be paid for any real estate needed for the purpose of this act, or to obtain from said owner or owners title in fee simple for the same, the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to enter upon and appropriate any real estate, which, in his judgment, is suitable and necessary for the purposes of this act.
