THE GREAT GRAVE AT WAILATPU

The large flat stone covers the remains of the thirteen victims of the massacre. One other, Peter D. Hall, fled unobserved by the Indians, but is supposed to have drowned en route to Fort Vancouver. The shaft marks the graves of Mr. and Mrs. Gray whose bodies were moved here from Astoria in 1916. Courtesy, Whitman Mission National Historic Site.

GREAT GRAVE DEDICATION, 1897

THREE OF THE SAGER SISTERS

WHITMAN MONUMENT AT WAILLATPU

On the knoll northeast of the Whitman homesite, where it was placed in 1897 at the fiftieth observance of the massacre. The view is to the east, toward the Blue Mountains, and in the direction of the Whitman's sawmill, some twenty-two miles distant. Courtesy, Whitman Mission National Historic Site.

THE MARCUS WHITMAN STATUE BY AVARD FAIRBANKS

Representing the State of Washington, Capitol Building, Washington, D.C. In frontier costume, with Bible and saddlebags to symbolize the missionary doctor. The saddlebags used by Whitman before going to Oregon are now in the Presbyterian Historical Society, Philadelphia. Below the statue is the inscription, from Marcus Whitman's letter of November 5, 1846: "My plans require time and distance." Courtesy, Whitman Mission National Historic Site.
